ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I have been indebted to many people throughout the process of doing research and writing this book. First of all, I want to thank all those who have participated in this research: teachers, head teachers, deputy head teachers, academics, Ministry officials, representatives of educational institutions, teacher unions, donors, and others in Uganda and Turkey. This book could not have been written without their assistance. I deeply appreciate their availability for the interviews and hope that the results of this study shall prove worth their time. I also would like to thank hundreds of pupils who warmly welcomed me to their classrooms, and the respective authorities for granting their permission for conducting this research.

I would like to thank my supervisors, Prof. Sjoerd Karsten and Assoc. Prof. Mario Novelli for their support and encouragement throughout the PhD project. I thank Sjoerd for being available whenever I needed, for his very constructive feedback on the articles, for suggesting very useful literature, and for encouraging me to publish articles in international journals. He has been an important source of inspiration and strength for me throughout the project. I thank Mario for providing so many new insights to my writing and for challenging me with new perspectives. Our discussions have often been an eye-opener for me. I have indeed felt privileged to have worked with him in the past four years. The confidence that both of my supervisors have shown in me and their appreciation of my work have been reassuring and have greatly helped me to weather the ups and downs of the PhD process. I would also like to thank Anke van Dam of the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs. She has been involved in various stages of my PhD study as an external supervisor and commented on a number of papers. I thank her for dedicating time in her busy schedule to my study, for her useful feedback, and for her never ending support and confidence. I would also like to acknowledge her as the person who encouraged me to embark on this PhD project in the first place.

I would also like to express my appreciation to the members of IS Academie/Education group at the University of Amsterdam, namely Margriet Poppema, Graciela Paillet, Mario Novelli, Antoni Verger, Mieke Lopes Cardozo, Magali Chelpi, Sanne van der Kaaij, Inti Maya Soeterik, Joosje Hoop and Isa Baud. The dynamism of our group, our numerous talks and exchanges have been an important source of inspiration and motivation for me. Their companionship has made my work more interesting, stimulating, enjoyable and fulfilling than it would have been otherwise. I am particularly glad to acknowledge the inspiration of Margriet Poppema, as she has been key to my growing interest in education and development. Furthermore, for assisting in funding my study, I am grateful to the Netherlands Ministry for Development Cooperation. Since 2005, the Ministry has contributed to the financing of the IS Academie programme on Education and International Development, and my PhD study constituted part of this programme.

A PhD is daunting by any standards but trying to do it with two little children was even more challenging. Therefore, I would like express my gratitude to my mother, Gülfinaz Koşar, and mother-in-law, Hatice Altınyelken, who left their homes in Turkey and came to the Netherlands several times (at three-month intervals) to help with the kids. Their support has been critical to this work, particularly my mother's as she has been in charge of the children during my fieldwork too. I would not dare to imagine how my PhD would have evolved without their care and support.

I would also like to thank my husband, Murat Altınyelken, for being incredibly patient with my irregular working hours and field trips, for reading every single paper I wrote even though my research topics did not even remotely relate to his work or personal interests, and for being such great support throughout the whole process. Finally, my deepest appreciation goes to my two beautiful children, Asya and Deniz, for bringing so much joy and happiness to my life, and for teaching me how to be ever more efficient and practical. I particularly thank my four and a half year old daughter Asya, for motivating me to finalise my work with her strong encouragement: 'Mum, you have been writing this all my life. I am fed up with your PhD! Finish it and start playing with me!'
