Over the years, the list of those who encouraged and supported me and stopped me from altogether dropping this project has grown to great numbers. Doubtlessly most active have been my promotores Bram Kempers and Ulrich Sinn, and in an earlier stage Herman Brijder. Their never-failing support has kept me going especially in the final phase, when the remainder of work began to outweigh the motivation for doing it.

Most time in writing a dissertation is spent sat at a computer; all the more welcome are the times when one is allowed to go out to do research. This study owes much to those who work at museums, libraries and research institutes. Of great importance have been the wonderful staff members of the Netherlands Institute at Athens, who put up with me year after year and whose support has often given me the energy to go on. The staff of various museums in Athens have been immensely kind and patient with my very lengthy lists of study requests, especially A. Mantis, I. Trianti and Chr. Vlassopoulou of the Akropolis Museum; A. Lazaridi of the First Ephoria; A. Choremi and J. Jordan of the Agora Museum; I. Touratsoglou and M. Salta of the National Museum; Ch. Kritsas and M. Tsouli of the Epigraphic Museum; J. Stroszeck, Th. Kyriakou and L. Parlama of the Kerameikos site and museum; and all those who put the many heavy pieces in place for me to study. Their knowledge of sculpture is in all cases impressive, and I could not have written this dissertation without them.

Libraries have been another favourite haunt over the years. I owe a debt of gratitude to Janta van Lienden, the librarian of the Netherlands Institute at Athens during my studies there, for sharing her great knowledge of libraries and bibliographical conventions with me and for many good talks about antiquity (and more recent times). The staff of the libraries of the British School and the Scuola Italiana in Athens often helped me, and I would like to thank them for their flexibility. I am grateful to the personnel of the University of Amsterdam Library, especially the Classics and Antiquity department, for continually getting me that one book from the storeroom when it was almost closing time.

When this project began, I received a full scholarship of the Institute for Culture and History of the University of Amsterdam. Without this stipend and the institute’s continuous support until the completion of this dissertation, it would not have been written. A great many thanks, therefore, to Burcht Pranger, Paul Koopman and Irene Zwiep for having seen something in this project, and perhaps more of a challenge, for never giving up on it.
The University of Amsterdam’s Archaeological Institute has been where I spent most of my research time, and its members have given me much incentive to work – and to take off to a pub with them. In particular I would like thank my instructors Joost Crouwel, Marijke Gnade Patricia Lulof, Eric Moormann and Kees Neeft, and my roommates at one point or another: Martine, Anneke, Lara, Hendrieneke, Olaf, Ellen, Anne and Jan. The person who has stuck with me to the end and back, and who will always be my roommate even if we were to work on different sides of the planet, is Lione du Piêd. I know you will finish yours soon, too.

Since a few years, Roosevelt Academy in Middelburg has replaced Amsterdam for me and a new set of colleagues have become friends. First I must thank Albert Clement and Mark Janse for being the best bosses a PhD student could wish for, as well as supportive friends. Because Roosevelt Academy is a small institution, my roommates here are in fact all over the building: Manon, Hans, Ernestine, Nancy, Ewa, Herman, Beatriz, Karolien, Els, Anya, Christine, Giles and Dorothee. Special thanks I owe to Kathrin Steigerwald, Emöke Jakab, Tina Lenz and Chad Weidner. Kathrin corrected my English on short notice and Emöke helped with statistics. Tina Lenz has done her usual brilliant work on designing this book. Chad has been my rock over the last years, sharing an office with me as well as the woes of our MA status.

So many friends have supported me during the process of writing this study that I cannot enumerate them all. Some of the dearest are Niki van Balen, Eva Fotiadi, Rinie and Max Hamel, Jorrit Kelder, Anna Konstantinou, Gertjan Negrijn, Lidy van Oort, Narender and Renate van Orshoven, Frans van Ruth, Friederike Sinn, Barbara Söhngen and Welmoed Westerveld. My neighbours Aad, Marjan and Julia have made me part of their family and the coffee, sweat and tears we shared could fill a medium-sized moat. Ronald Hamel has in fact saved this project on numerous occasions, not only by being an extraordinary friend, but also because he is an equally extraordinary mentor and scholar.

The Allard Pierson Museum in Amsterdam is a special place, and so are the people who work there. I would like to mention in particular René van Beek, Geralda Jurriaans–Helle and Ron Leenheer, whose knowledge and understanding have helped me both in motivation and academically. The same applies to colleagues of the Classics and Ancient History departments of the University of Amsterdam and of Utrecht University. Albert Rijksbaron and Mathieu de Bakker of Classics, and ancient historians Emily Hemelrijk and Josine Blok have been very generous with their time and knowledge. A very special mention deserves Jaap Hemelrijk, who grounded me in sculpture and who is the most critical and careful reader anyone could wish for.
Of all those dear to me, my family have probably suffered most over the years of research and writing. Endless telephone calls were spent trying to cheer me up when things got stuck or results were baffling. My father Rolf Hochscheid and his partner Barbara Cook have been wonderful in their intellectual support as well as their subtle hints that they would not love me less if I did not finish it. They probably realised this would only make me more eager to complete it. My aunt and uncle, Chriesta and Edmond Langezaal, have listened over the years to far too long hours of archaeological explanations, fortunately over excellent food and wine which they provided. My two sisters Doris and Oda just amaze me. They both juggle studies and busy careers and yet are always there for me when I need them – which has been frequently. My partner Michael Burke promised a few years back that he would do for me what I did for him when he was completing his PhD thesis, and he has been as good as his word. His conviction that it would be finished one day has pulled me out of many a foul mood. But most importantly, my life has been both beautiful and silly since he entered it: an ideal breeding ground for scholarship.

When years ago, I decided that archaeology was what I wanted to do, my mother said it was just the kind of practical thing that would suit me. She did so from a hospital bed, and she never lived to see that as so often, she was right. To her and others who have died untimely deaths, this study is dedicated.
