I am very grateful to Bernhard Kittel for all the inspiration and guidance he provided as my promoter during the entire PhD trajectory. After I started to work with Bernhard, many concepts and tools that I have mistakenly associated with the pragmatic logic of engineers appeared under a new light. He showed me that the line dividing the quantitative cosmos from the qualitative one is much more blurred than I have realized and there are many channels connecting the two. Thanks to his permanent encouragement and sound advice, I started to perceive the analytical instruments of mathematics and computer science as the keys to a new perception of the social world. This is the greatest gain of the last four years for me.

Many times during the course of this research, I was overwhelmed by the vastness of possible explorations, meanings and contingencies. However, whenever I found myself drowning in an empirical chaos which seemed to be devoid of any meaning, I was very lucky to have Jelle Visser as one of my promoters. Many times in our meetings, Jelle connected all the loose ends with few sentences and interpreted the puzzling empirical material from surprisingly new theoretical perspectives. This dissertation would not be concluded without his creative imagination. I am very thankful to him.

During this research, Ayşe Buğra was one of my primary sources of inspiration. Thanks to her work and advice, I realized that economy is a realm which is constrained and shaped by human values rather than by implicit formulas. None of the core findings of this dissertation would be possible without her constructive criticism. Besides her invaluable help in my research, Ayşe Buğra also set an example for me for the way in which a social scientist should be concerned about the world and engaged with politics.

I am also very grateful to Annette Freyberg-Inan who always found time to make very sharp and constructive comments for the long papers that I sent her at the critical junctures of the research. Her suggestions enabled me to make realistic decisions and greatly contributed to the completion of the work.

The International Political Economy Club of the Amsterdam School for Social Science Research has been the most important discussion environment for me during the last four years. All the themes that I tried to explore in this dissertation were first debated and improved in the IPE club. I would like to thank everybody participated in the IPE sessions. But I am especially grateful to Brian Burgoon not only for his comments and suggestions, but also for his exemplary scholarship which substantially influenced me.

I am very happy to have discovered Roberto Franzosi’s journey from words to numbers. After reading his books and articles, I was also lucky enough to meet Franzosi in person and benefit from his enormously wide knowledge ranging from industrial relations to linguistics and from time series analysis to medieval chronicles. I am grateful to him for all the suggestions and inspiration.

During the last four years, I had the privilege of having long conversations with brilliant scholars Valerie Robillard, Peter Geschiere, George Robillard and Marcel van der Linden. Thanks to their generosity for sharing knowledge, I could enlarge my horizon and look at the empirical material from different perspectives.

With some people in the academia it was possible to go beyond the confines of the academic debate: Hester Houwing, Ward Berenschot, Derya Özkan, Katharina Paul, Mohammed Waked, Marten Boekelo, Damian Raess, Deasy Simandjuntak, Benson Mulemi, Anouk de Koning, Min Zou, Mihai Varga, Jon Fahlander, Frank van As, Michiel Baas, Marta Kahancova, Nynke Wiekenkamp, Ayşem Mert, Christian Scholl, Jasper Blom, Monica Ewa Kaminska, Lutz Hofer, Shifra Kisch, Luc Fransen, Bahar Sakzoğlu, Liza Nell, Miriyam Aouragh, Daniel Muegge; I would like to thank you for all the inspiring conversations and exchange of ideas.

I also would like to thank once again to Nol Revarda who opened the gates of the academia for me and to Edwin Koning-Bastian who helped me in most difficult circumstances. It was their confidence in me which allowed me to discover that seeking knowledge may become a life style.

I am very much indebted to Mustafa Demir (from Kazova Construction) for providing access to the business circles, to Fatoş Çağlar for her invaluable help in Istanbul, to Nizamettin Barış for all the interviews he arranged, to Greetje Lansbergen and Jan Lansbergen for their wisdom, to Nursel Barış for her endless hospitality, and to Seda Altuğ, Nilufer Akay and Ulaş Doğu Atlı for their friendship. Çok teşekkürler.
The only unpleasant thing which accompanied my research was the rise of xenophobia in both of the countries that I have resided. This mad obsession with the imagined qualities of “us” and “them” had two implications for me: in one country, I was constantly annoyed by those who considered me, rather inexplicably, one of “us”, and in the other one, I was confronted with serious legal problems, which directly or indirectly resulted from being considered one of “them”. During these difficult times, Anneke Dammers, Miriyam May, Hermance Mettrop, Teun Bijvoet, and especially Jose Komen worked very hard to keep me “in”. I would like to thank them once again, without their support this research would not be completed. The legal problems were finally solved by the dedicated efforts of “the” lawyer Marcelien van Straten. I am very grateful to her.

Unfortunately, the obsession with the imagined qualities has not yet ended in either country. I sincerely hope that people who find themselves included into any “us” will no longer be lured by the Sirens into the path of madness.

Aşiban, Armağan, Denizhan, _ _ _ . size söyleyebileceğim şeylerin sınırı var ama hissettiklerimin sınırı yok. Tüm yardımlarınızı ve desteğiniz için bir kez daha çok çok teşekkürler.

My old friends; Kemal, Ruşer, Levent, Patrick, Devrim, Sergey, Göksu, Baran, Perihan, Sarper, Christoforos, and Sancar, as always, were very helpful, encouraging and inspiring. I owe them so much. Hepinizi çok sağolun.

Ayşe Demir and Leo Weusten, it is not possible to express my gratitude sufficiently in any language. En zor ve en güzel zamanlarda hep yanımda oldunuz; bu çalışma ve daha pek çok şey siz olmasaydniz olmayacaktı, sonsuz teşekkürler.

and,

Rukan’cim; herşeyi, hepsini, geridekileri, geçmiştekileri, gelecekleri ve gelecektekileri aynı anda ifade etmek çok zor, ama bunun için bir simge var : ∞
