This dissertation has been written in time ‘snatched’ in the years after the fieldwork was conducted in 1994-1995. This third ‘job’ was added to the double burden of a demanding and stressful full-time job and the pleasurable yet time-consuming responsibility for childcare. Time actually spent on the thesis was fragmented and disjointed, with each cycle of writing and reflection repeatedly interrupted. This created its own cycle of despair and tension, as the darkness of the tunnel seemed to stretch on endlessly. That I and the dissertation have finally emerged into the light is because of the tremendous support I received over the years from family, friends and colleagues. I am deeply grateful to my promoter, Professor Jan Breman, whose support, patience and understanding have been crucial. I continue to derive inspiration from his work and from his commitment to the cause of labour. His critical comments on the final drafts were very useful, and I thank him for gracefully accepting my stubborn refusal to amputate even more sections. I am relieved that I can finally thank and repay my debt to WOTRO for a one-year grant.

Professor Geertje Lycklama has combined the role of promoter, colleague and friend over the years – I thank her for her insightful comments, continuous support and encouragement. Her wise guidance was often delivered after jumping on her bicycle and arriving at my door. Just as she helped wallpaper a room when I shifted house, she has in ‘Dutch’ style helped in getting messy drafts into good order. Professor Diane Wolf stepped in as fairy godmother to join the supervisory committee – the wand and the little red velvet thesis diary she designed for me lay next to my computer as I incorporated her excellent comments on the first draft. Unfortunately it took more than magic to finish. As I periodically disappeared and deadlines passed, her humour, empathy and sympathy over the upheavals in my life and the shenanigans of the WGD/ISS in the last few years kept my spirits up, as did re-reading her book on factory daughters – one of three favourite books that inspired my work.

This thesis would not have been completed if Professor Bert Helmsing had not granted me 100 days of ISS time. This was the first instance I was given time, and as a good manager he knew this would also act as an incentive to complete the thesis – my heartfelt thanks. I greatly appreciate Professor Henk Thomas’ comments from a labour/firm perspective and his concern. My thanks to Professor Ashwani Saith for dismissing my agonies over ‘the poverty line’, and for reminding me that a crow should not try to be a peacock. The final product bears the stamp of Renée Pittin, who exceeded her role as editor. Her detailed and excellent comments on each chapter, furious exclamations at missing references and ‘casual’ statements, an involvement that extended to hunting down the websites of companies in the study and the instantaneous email exchange in the last weeks as I made the corrections she suggested – it was like collaborating again as we did co-editing a book in 1996. Many thanks for all this and for coming through as only good friends can.

Thanh-Dam Truong has been a constant and multileveled source of support, offering critical and useful comments on the first draft, providing interesting articles, pushing me on when inertia and despair would take over, sharing childcare, cooking and the emotional dramas of handling two boys who continuously challenged our attempts at feminist socialisation! Saskia Wieringa for encouraging comments on the first draft and regular kicks to get the damn thing done. Nandita Shah, Nandita Gandhi and Sujata Gotheroskar for the ‘collective’ period of research – the joys, trials and tribulations of our project remain an important determinant of our individual contributions – Nandu especially for crucial warmth and support in the last weeks. Thanks to Prof. Nira Yuval Davis for the title and encouragement.

Dr Shekhar Lal Gupta accompanied me in the fieldwork; his capacity to relate with workers opened many doors. It was a pleasure working with him and he continues to send me updates. Thanks to A.J.C. Bose, who flooded me with many relevant articles and references and to Ranjana Padih and Tara Negi for joining in the interviewing. Ranjana transcended the academic/activism divide by getting involved in the ongoing workers’ struggle and building links with the democratic rights and women’s movement. Grateful thanks to Rosalind Mellis for the many coloured editing pencils that whipped the first rough chapters into presentable shape and to Joy Misa for formatting and Word tricks that transformed the way it looked. Thanks to Trix van der Schalk for the Dutch translation. The ISS library staff, always helpful, pleasantly kept extending overdue books, and the computer department, especially John Steenwinkel, cheerfully responded to my desperate pleas for help. Many thanks to Willy Hooymans and Pauline Spoor-Rijn for last minute printing and posting.

Many other people, through gestures, words and hugs, have kept me going: grateful thanks to Mia Berden, who has been a pillar of support since I came to Holland – her energy and commitment continues to provide inspiration. Dieu Dé Truong offered compassion, deep breathing and hope in her words: ‘the flower will bloom when its time comes’. Wicky Meynen was always a great source of wisdom and encouragement, and a restorer of confidence. Rekha Wazir for warm support – her apt little postcard messages helped relativise my situation and lighten my spirit. Loes Keysers shared with me the agonies and ambivalence of thesis writing. Els Mulder gave encouragement and José Haanappel provided regular and cheerful support as I juggled with the Convenorship of the WGD program, teaching and the thesis. Nirmala Nair sent crystal and star energies from South Africa, reminding me to be ‘centred’. Kumkum Sangari gave timely good advice and support, Sonia Jabbar positive thumps on the back. Sunila Abeyesekera, Nighat Said Khan, Abha Bhaiya, Kamla Bhasin, Ritu Menon kept faith with me, believing (and at times disbelieving!) that the writing would be done someday and I could return to our South Asian work. Ruth Waterman offered her warm friendship and continuous attempts to make me live life more fully. Harsh Kapoor, Peter Waterman and many other friends maintained a discreet silence on the ‘thing’ but kept me engaged with the world of politics and social movements. Dr C. Mead helped in recognising dementors and boggarts and ways to deal with institutional and personal politics. My students, many WGD participants over the years, recharged depleted energies through the pleasures of teaching – thank you all for being there and keeping faith.

I am deeply grateful to my father, General Chhachhi, who has remained puzzled at why this took so long – his unfailing support despite his disagreement with my choices make him an exceptional man. Thanks to Karamat Ali who has had to shuttle between his work in Pakistan and the demands of a family in The Hague. He has helped in many ways, given insights and suggestions based on his wide experience in the labour movement, and will share in the relief that this is finally done. Jogi Panghal for perceptive observations as he accompanied me with his camera – from the textile mills of Ahmedabad to the electronic factories in Delhi – many thanks for continuing dialogue and visual comments. My sister Sheba Chhachhi has been integrally linked with my work: collecting data, designing the cover, even reading and commenting on what she, as an artist, would consider a boring academic, non-poetic presentation. I could not have managed without her wise words and positive energy. My son Nanku now has childhood memories inscribed with the dominant image of his mother at a computer – he has borne the pressures of the last years with patience, and has helped me in many ways – even checking the tables to ensure that they add up. It is because of him that I have finally finished. Now we can begin to live life without a PhD hanging over our heads!

This study is dedicated to Paul Kurian, whose strong commitment to labour inspired many and whose early death has been a great loss – I have deeply missed his intellectual companionship. My greatest debt is to the workers who shared their time and their lives so generously with me – there is much I have learnt from them.
