Why we choose, how we choose, what we choose: the influence of decision initiation motives on decision making
McNeill, I.M.

Citation for published version (APA):
McNeill, I. M. (2011). Why we choose, how we choose, what we choose: the influence of decision initiation motives on decision making
Acknowledgements

Completing a PhD project can be like climbing a mountain: Pleasure and struggles are often intertwined and the toughest confrontations occur during the second half, on your way back down. After five years of climbing and descending, and five chapters later, this dissertation is nearly finished. What is left is a blanc page that I would like to fill with a great big thank you to all the people who have somehow contributed to the fact that this work is about to be completed.

First, I’d like to thank my supervisors Bernard Nijstad, Carsten de Dreu and Michel Handgraaf for giving me the opportunity to learn so much in a very high quality research environment. You have definitely helped me in developing a sound set of skills and interests that I know will serve me well in many years to come. Also, I would like to thank Tory Higgins for making time to work with me during my visit at Columbia University. I very much enjoyed our talks about motivation, agency, expertise, and engagement (amongst other things). They supplied great fuel for thought, and even though I am currently heading towards a more applied research environment, I will continue to follow your work with great interest.

Thank you colleagues (old and new) for the time we spent both inside and outside the office. You answered many of my questions and caused many good laughs. I can only hope for the ‘spring onions’ at my new workplace to be just as good. A special thanks to Matthijs and Paul for being such great roommates, I know both of you will do well in whatever path you choose in life, and to Femke for helping me with programming when I was physically unable to, and of course for all the fun times spent.

I would like to say a double thank you to my family and friends for all your support and encouragement, especially during some challenging phases. I could have never done this without you. Thank you parents for believing in me and giving me the time and space I needed to complete this project. Thank you, friends, for offering such great pastime and getting my mind off work. This was definitely needed to avoid getting sucked into the vortex of endless pondering, and to actually get things done in the end.

Finally, thank you Michael for helping me through the final editorial stages and designing such an awesome cover.

I hope to continue sharing my life with many of you, whether from far or close by. You all inspire me in your own unique way.

Ilona (a.k.a. Illy)