Conducting the research reported in this dissertation has been a truly amazing experience. I am in great debt to my dear supervisors Carsten De Dreu and Michel Handgraaf for the terrific guidance throughout the four year project. The meetings with you were always thought provoking, inspiring and challenging. Perhaps not less important, they were also a lot of fun. Carsten, I cannot even begin describing how much I learned from you during this project. You taught me how to focus on what really matters, to think of creative yet systematic methods to test our ideas, and how to write them up. Perhaps most important, you taught me how to ask important, big and interesting theoretical questions. Michel, you have been there for me whenever needed not only as a great mentor but also as a close friend. You introduced me to the Dutch scientific community and also to Amsterdam the city. I look forward for working with both of you in the years to come, thanks!

I wish to thank the many other colleagues at the Work and Organizational Psychology department at the University of Amsterdam, other psychology departments both in Amsterdam as well as in other parts of The Netherlands, for the opportunity to discuss research ideas and have a good time doing so. The Netherlands is an amazing place to live and work in. Many thanks also to colleagues around the world which provided valuable feedback on the work described here during conferences and visits. My dear 10.01 office mates deserve many warm words – you all made it so much fun to come to the office every day. It is not trivial to find people who are in sync with one another and together with you we managed to get our good vibe and positive karma going. You are the best! Special thanks are due to Jason Dana and Maurice Schweitzer who so warmly welcomed me to their labs and provided me with a unique opportunity to see how research is done on the other side of the ocean. I greatly appreciate this opportunity (however short it was) and look forward for future collaborations.

To all my loved family and friends – I could have not done it without you. You were always there for me providing non-work related sanity and support. I love you all a lot! Finally, to my loved partner – this journey wouldn’t have been so amazing without you there with me. You are an amazing person and I’m happy to be the fortunate one by your side.

Yours, Shaul
