This doctoral thesis has spanned the last five years of my life, and consequently, the final content has been shaped by marking encounters with people, art works, images, cities and other projects. Still, the encouragement, inspiration, and participation of some people were truly indispensable to the completion of this manuscript. I want to acknowledge them here.

To begin with, I express my deepest gratitude to my thesis advisor Patricia Pisters for taking an interest in this project and accepting to guide me through to its culmination. Her acute insights, to-the-point feedback and non-imposing - but always watchful- eye, allowed me the leeway to work things out in part for myself, while at the same time, feeling confident that I was somehow moving in the right direction. I was also very fortunate to have an advisor who was so enthusiastic and supportive of the projects that arose along side my dissertation. Finally, her kindness and generosity made the experience truly enjoyable.

I want to thank the Amsterdam School of Cultural Analysis for hosting my dissertation, for welcoming me so warmly to Amsterdam, for its inspiring faculty and seminars, and for providing me with crucial resources, including an office and financial support in my final year. A very heartfelt thanks to Eloe Kingma for her sunshine warmth and all her help these past five years.

I am very obliged to Annelies Moors, Deborah Cherry, Sudeep Dasgupta, Mireille Rosello, Sven Lütticken, and Anneke Smelik, for kindly accepting to be on my promotion committee.

I want to acknowledge the profound contribution of artists Farheen Haq, Jayce Salloum, Martine Neddam, Linda Wallace, and Hussein Chalayan, whose works have literally given shape to the arguments in this dissertation. Thank you for the viewing copies, photos, conversations and email exchanges that were all-important for my analysis.

For broadening the theoretical perspectives onto my topic, I wish to thank Johanna Burton, and especially Ron Clark. I am extremely thankful for a truly stimulating year at the Whitney Independent Study Program in New York, an experience that has strongly influenced the final year of revising and rewriting the chapters of this dissertation.

For her enthusiasm, diligence, and eye for details in editing my manuscript, and above all, for being a real pleasure to work with, I am very grateful to Rachel Galvin.

In Amsterdam, I have met and become friends with so many amazing people. I want to thank in particular my office colleagues at the University of Amsterdam: Pepita Hesselberth, Ariane Noël de Tilly, Lucy Cotter, Erin La Cour, and Aylin Kuryel.
For their hardworking and bubbling energies that spurred me to get to the office everyday and get to work, and for the innumerable ways in which they supported and helped me carry this project to its completion, I am very indebted to Alex Brown and Margaret Tali. For the great discussions over coffee breaks and reading suggestions, thank you so much Walid el Houri.

For their friendship over the years, refreshing perspectives and creative input, I am grateful to Irina Nazarova and Anthony Burnham, you are both continual sources of inspiration in my life.

I wish to express my gratitude to the Fonds québécois de recherché sur la société et la culture (FQRSC) for the doctoral fellowship that made this doctorate financially possible.

Finally, for their support and unconditional love, I want to thank my family: Mom, for always being there and for listening, Dad, for your relentless enthusiasm and challenging comments, Stefan and Deryk for the fruitful discussions and revisions of the various versions of my chapters. Harrie and Roelie, thank you for always stepping in when I needed some extra help and for providing me with a family here in the Netherlands.

My little Willem, I had hoped to finish this before you arrived, but in the end you have been a great companion in the last stage of this endeavor, a joyful presence to have around when writing and a great buddy for the numerous trips into the office. You are a real treasure. Jos, thank you for your continual support, and above all, for your patience over the last several months during which it has been little one during the day, and thesis in the evenings, and not much time for you. Thank you for standing by and helping me see this project through. Merci, du fond du coeur.
