Rules & legislation on love charms in early medieval Ireland

Borsje, H.J.

Published in:
Peritia

DOI:
10.1484/J.PERIT.1.102374

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: http://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.
Rules & Legislation on Love Charms in Early Medieval Ireland

Jacqueline Borsje

Abstract. Love magic is defined as verbal and material instruments by which erotic and affectionate feelings are believed to be aroused or destroyed in a supernatural way. This is a discussion of love magic as it is presented in early medieval Hiberno-Latin penitentials and Irish legal texts.

Keywords. Love magic, maleficium, epaid, Penitential of Finnian, Penitential of Columbanus, legal texts, Senchas mar, Cethairshlicht abhagalae, O’Davoren’s Glossary, Heptads, Bretha cróilige, Triads, Middle Irish Life of St Brigit, Hincmar of Rheims, Constantinus Africanus, Pantechn, spells, charms, aphrodisiacs, sex, impotence, marriage, gender, dogs, bones.

other religions.³ For those cultures in which magic had or has such a dubious reputation, the study of magic is a search in the shadows and margins, and one needs a hermeneutics of suspicion. What is not said? What is absent? What is hidden? Which heterodox elements contradict the orthodox mainstream of condemnation?

Medieval Irish textual witnesses to ‘magic’ are complex and sometimes multilayered. Given Christian orthodoxy, we expect a dichotomy between saints and spells. Yet we have various Irish textual witnesses in which spells are attributed to saints.⁴ Elsewhere,⁵ I analyse the tradition that St Brigit is asked for a charm or spell (epaid).⁶ Her gift of blessed water can thus be considered a form of ‘love magic’ and is, therefore, a good case study of the complexity present in this textual tradition. I define love magic as verbal and material instruments with which erotic and affectionate feelings are believed to be aroused or destroyed in a supernatural way. This paper deals with the views of the medieval Irish who wrote penitential and legal texts, and who make mention of religious practices and beliefs that can be clustered under the term ‘love magic’.

1. ECCLESIASTICAL RULES

Magic is forbidden in the Bible; hence, love magic is listed among the sins in the penitentials. The oldest Irish penitential is that of Finnian, written at some time before 591.⁷ It refers to certain beliefs and practices by the term maleficium, literally ‘an evil deed’, translated by Bieler as ‘magic’. Thus the word itself condemns what it describes. Interestingly, love magic is deemed less serious a transgression than magic in general (maleficium) in this penitential. We read this among the following rules:

_Si quis clericus uel si qua mulier malifica uel malificus si aliquem malificio suo

³. For example, see the collections in E. A. W. Budge, _Amulets and talismans_ (New York 1961) and D. C. Skemer, _Binding words: textual amulets in the middle ages_ (University Park PA 2006).

⁴. I am working on a monograph on this subject.

⁶. The English words ‘charm’ (carmen) and ‘spell’ (a Germanic word) refer to enchantments of a verbal character; ‘charm’ also signifies a concrete object, comparable to the concept of amulets (see OED s.v.). Similarly, Irish _epaid_ may refer both to words and objects.

deciperat, inmane peccatum est sed per penitentiam redimi potest; sex annis peniteat, tribus cum pane et aqua per mensura et in residuis iii. annis abstineat a uino et a carnibus. Si autem non deciperat aliquem sed pro inlecebroso amore dederat alicui, annum integrum peniteat cum pane et aqua per mensura. Si mulier maleficio suo partum alicuius perdererit, dimedium annum cum pane et aqua peniteat per mensurα et duobus annis abstineat a uino et a carnibus et sex quadragesimas <ieiunet> cum pane et aqua’ If any cleric or woman who practises magic have led astray anyone by their magic, it is a monstrous sin, but it can be expiated by penance. (Such an offender) shall do penance for six years, three years on an allowance of bread and water, and during the remaining three years he shall abstain from wine and meat. If, however, such a person has not led astray anyone but has given [something] for the sake of wanton love to someone, he shall do penance for an entire year on an allowance of bread and water. If a woman by her magic destroys the child she has conceived of somebody, she shall do penance for half a year with an allowance of bread and water, and abstain for two years from wine and meat and fast for the six forty-day periods with bread and water. Those who practise love magic are, in this text, said to be evildoing clerics and evildoing women or sorceresses. Love magic is not deemed to be leading astray or deception and appears to be aphrodisiac. Bieler adds the words ‘a potion’ in parentheses in his translation; the Latin text does not specify the nature of the object given to obtain love. The term maleficiwm is implied but not used for this love-inducing object. A variety of things were (rightly or wrongly) believed to be aphrodisiacs: herbs, plants, roots, mushrooms, animal parts, human body hair and secretions, text on parchment, baptismal oil, a communion wafer, or mix-

8. This line reads literally: ‘If any cleric (clericus) or if any evildoing woman (mulier malifica; i.e. sorceress) or evildoing man (malificus; i.e. sorcerer) has led someone astray by their evil deed (maleficiwm; i.e. sorcery)’. Bieler’s translation is, however, correct. His edition is based upon Vienna, National Library, lat. 2233 (Theol. lat. 725), c.800, which reads: clericiu si qua mulier malificacu. Malificacu is a non-existent word. The scribe wrote l- (uel ‘or’) in the margin of the manuscript. As Anthony Harvey kindly pointed out to me, the scribe intended to write a kind of shorthand for the feminine and masculine forms. We would nowadays write this as malefica, -cus. There is another example of this shorthand in the same manuscript, where the scribe wrote pecatrix, with or above trix and l- in the margin, hereby meaning peccatrix vel peccator, ‘female or male sinner’ (Bieler, Penitentials, 86, line 10). I thank Ingrid Sperber, Anthony Harvey and Jane Power for discussing this passage with me. The readings of the other manuscripts are: clericus maleficus uel si qua mulier malefica (St Gall, Stiftsbibliothek 150, s. ix); clericus maleficus uel si qua mulier malefica (Paris, BN, lat. 12021, s. x; clericus uel si qua mulier malefica (Paris, BN, lat. 3182 (Codex Bigotianus), s. x).

It is significant that the item of love magic is preceded by magic in general (maleficium) and followed by abortion by magic (maleficium). There is a similar ordering of things in the penitential of St Columbanus, which is dependent on Finnian’s and was written after 591. Destruction by magic (maleficium) is followed by love magic that does not involve destruction, and the paragraph ends with abortion. It differs from Finnian in its focus on gender: Columbanus uses only masculine forms for the performers: Si autem pro amore quis maleficus sit et neminem perdiderit, ‘If, however, someone is an evildoer/sorcerer for love and he has destroyed no one’, after which he lists the different penances for clerics, laymen, deacons and priests. Women are mentioned only in the context of abortion in the phrase concerning someone who has destroyed the birth/bringing forth by a woman (mulieris partum) ‘through this’ (per hoc, maleficium is implied). We will see below, in the context of the Irish law texts, why the literal wording is important here. We note yet another difference from Finnian who mentioned women performing an abortion on themselves with magic (maleficium), whereas Columbanus refers to ‘whoever’ (quisque) performs an abortion. In the penitential of Columbanus, this transgression is connected with the previous one; the penance for abortion is an extra punishment added to the penance for love magic. ‘Anyone’ thus refers to any person from the previously mentioned four kinds of transgressor (clerics, laymen, deacons and priests).

11. See, for instance, E. Long, ‘Aphrodisiacs, charms, and philtres’, Western Folklore 32/3 (1973) 153–63. Examples from Irish narratives are blessed water, nuts transformed with aipthi (plural of epaid) and herbs from the síde, ‘hollow hills’ or Otherworld (for the first two examples, see my forthcoming ‘The power of words’; for the last reference, which I owe to Józsi Nagy, see Whitkey Stokes (ed. & tr.), Acallamh na senórach, in Whitley Stokes & Ernst Windisch (ed.), Irische Texte, iv.1 (Leipzig 1900) 28, lines 984–95; A. Dooley & Harry Roe (tr), Tales of the elders of Ireland (Acallam na senórach) (Oxford 1999) 31–32. Examples of texts that are said to induce love are the Insular Celtic Leiden lorica (Michael W. Herren (ed), The Hisperica famina, ii. Related poems (Toronto 1987) 90–93 and the Hiberno-Latin text ‘O lux nostra’ which has an Irish prescription on its use (R. I. Best, ‘Some Irish charms’, Ériu 16 (1952) 27–32: 28–29).

13. For the text and translation, see Bieler, Penitentials, 100–01 §6.

14. ibid. 100.

15. Two Bobbio manuscripts (Turin, Biblioteca nazionale, G. VII. 16 and G. V. 38) read quis which Bieler edited as quis[que] which appears to be correct in the light of all forms being masculine in this passage; Patrick Fleming has quisquam; his Vorlage, now lost, derives from the same exemplar as the two Bobbio ones. It is unclear whether the individual readings in Fleming’s edition stem from the lost manuscript or are his own (Bieler, Penitentials, 15–16, 100).
Love magic is not explicitly mentioned in the Old Irish penitential, dated to the end of the eighth century. If, however, the cluster ‘general magic–love magic–abortion’ has influenced this penitential, it may be included in a general reference to charms or spells, mentioned after the transgression of abortion. As in the penitential of Finnian, women are here said to be the performers of abortion, although the Old Irish penitential does not refer to supernatural means by which it is done. Various degrees of seriousness are listed for those who cause ‘miscarriage of that which she has conceived’ (v §6). Sorcery is mentioned in the item immediately following the one on abortion (v §7):

*Nech tober epthi nó dogni arracht nó tober tonnuath conidapail nech de .uii. anni pendit amail cach donorcuin. Manib marb nech de tri bliadna pendite ‘Anyone who gives aipthi or makes an apparition / a spectre or gives a poisonous drink so that someone dies of it, seven years’ penance, as for a homicide. If no one dies of it, three years’ penance’.

Elsewhere, I have argued that the term epaid (pl. aipthi), translated as a charm or spell in DIL, is comparable to the Greek term φα ΄ρµακον; epaidó is a supernatural instrument that can destroy, poison, create and heal and that may be accompanied by, or consist of, words of power. The primary meaning of tonnad is ‘death’; violent killings in battle are mentioned earlier in v §4 and are not so severely punished as this instance, which seems to deal with deaths brought about by obscure means and accomplished by stealth. Death by poisoning appears to be the transgression here. I mention this instance because there is a certain overlap between the concepts of poison and of spells/charms.

18. Gwynn translates ‘drugs’.
19. Gwynn translates ‘a bogey’.
21. ‘Miraculous magic in medieval Ireland: the epaid (spell), part 1’, 17 March 2006, keynote address at the 28th Annual University of California Celtic Studies Conference, held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the Celtic Studies Association of North America, UCLA.
The Old Irish penitential classifies this set of transgressions under the vice ‘anger’, which makes it reasonable to suggest that what is in question here is the use of supernatural means to harm people. When death ensues it is considered to be as serious a crime as murder. On the other hand, death is not necessarily the outcome. As we will see below, commentaries on law texts refer to experiments with love magic that may inadvertently end in death. This line of thought—causing death by inadvertence—may have played a role in the Old Irish penitential as well. We are, however, not certain whether the aipthi in that text refers to love magic or whether such were so understood. The foregoing item on abortion seems to indicate this possibility, in that a similar set of transgressions has been grouped together, as in the penitentials of Finnian and Columbanus. In any case, we are dealing with transgressions in secret.

The final ecclesiastical text on rules of behaviour discussed here is the Old Irish Law of Adomnán. This is not a penitential but a church legal tract that prescribes fines for transgressions (penance is mentioned only in §§33, 35). This text also connects to murder the giving of aipthi to someone. Interestingly, the fines for secret murder should be paid for it:

\[ \text{Mát epthai dia n-apallar dabera nech do alalíu, fēich dunetáiti ind, ‘If it be charms (aipthi) from which death ensues that anyone give to another, the fines of murder followed by concealment of the corpse [are to be paid] for it’.} \]

This transgression is part of §46 that deals with deaths caused by unidentified perpetrators. Corpses are presumably found and any evidence pointing to the identity of the murderer is absent. Besides aipthi, mention is made of dub-chrecha, literally ‘dark raids’, and cnámchrói, which is difficult to translate. It might literally be ‘bone-wounds, -blood, -death’, but this remains uncertain. Just as in the case of the Old Irish penitential, we are dealing with crimes committed in secret. Hence a method of divination is prescribed to find the culprit.

24. Meyer, 30–31. Ní Dhonnchadha (op. cit. 66) translates: ‘Should it be charms from which one dies that anyone give to another, fines for body-concealment for it’.

25. ‘secret plunderings’ (Meyer), ‘secret raids’ (DIL), or ‘dire mutilations’ (Ní Dhonnchadha).

26. Meyer suggests cnám-chró, but offers no translation; ‘dismemberments’ is suggested by Máirín Ní Dhonnchadha.
This set of crimes is preceded by a well-known section on capital punishment for women; the law prescribes that women should be sent adrift in a boat as an alternative to the death penalty. Women deserve but should not suffer the death penalty when they kill someone, administer lethal poison (neim), commit arson or dig under a church (§45).

From the initial cluster of ‘magic in general–love magic–abortion’, only the first item is present in §46. Whether love magic is included in this crime is not clear. The transgression is gender neutral. Women are associated with killing through poisoning in the previous section.

Considering the textual material presented above, we see that these sources do not give a term for ‘love magic’. The Latin texts seem to use maleficium, a general term, meaning ‘evil deed’, and one used for beliefs and practices associated with the concept of ‘magic’. The Irish texts use aiptbi, ‘charms, spells’. The perpetrators in the Latin texts are clerics and sorceresses (Finnian), or clerics, laymen, deacons and priests (Columbanus). The Irish texts are gender neutral: anyone (nech) may make use of charms or spells. Concerning the outcome of the action the Latin texts refer to love and the Irish ones to death, and we note that poison (tonnad, neim) is mentioned in the immediate context in the latter case.

We should be aware, however, that the Latin texts may also imply a mortal danger. Because magic is generally seen as a religious transgression in the medieval Christian context, we are inclined to interpret ‘destruction’ brought about by maleficium as moral corruption. If we look, however, at the verbs used for abortion in these two texts, we realise that ‘destruction’ may also imply death. Finnian uses decipio, ‘to catch, ensnare, entrap, beguile, elude, deceive, cheat’, for ‘destruction’ in the sentences on general magic and love magic and perdo, ‘to make away with, destroy, ruin, to squander, dissipate, throw away, waste, lose’, in the phrase on abortion. Columbanus uses perdo in the first two cases (magic in general and love magic) and decipio for abortion. The Latin penitentials may, therefore, have been interpreted as referring to death as a result of maleficium as well.

Lastly, we are totally in the dark about the way the supernatural aim was thought to be accomplished. Finnian seems to refer to an object given ‘for very enticing love’ (pro inlecebroso amore), whereas Columbanus refers to someone who becomes a sorcerer ‘for love’ (pro amore). The Irish texts seem primarily to imply the giving of an object, and this might have been influenced by the penitential of Finnian, but we should note that do-beir not only means ‘gives’ but also ‘utters, pronounces’. It is, therefore, possible that both the giving of charms and the uttering of spells may be meant by the Irish texts. Secrecy appears to be part of the context of the Irish texts. Both tangible visible objects and invisible words may have been part of the performance by which one tried to influence reality. We will also see this ambiguity in the language of the Irish law texts.

II. VERNACULAR LAWS

Using ‘magic’ is equally condemned in Senchús már, the best-preserved collection of medieval Irish law, probably organised as a unit c.800.\(^{27}\) Four items in a list of offences\(^{28}\) in the Old Irish tract Cethairsblicht athgabalae,\(^{29}\) are relevant to our subject. There are three manuscript versions of the list or of parts of it, which I call versions (a), (b) and (c). Version (a) in Dublin, Trinity College, 1337 (H. 3. 18) is an Old Irish fragment of the original law text, The glosses in this version are also Old Irish.\(^{30}\) Version (b) in London, BL, Harley 432, is part of a continuous copy of the law tract.\(^{31}\) Version (c) in Dublin, Trinity College, 1336 (H. 3. 17) occurs in longer extracts with later glosses and commentaries.\(^{32}\)

28. The whole list is edited and translated in ALI i 174–77, and runs as follows (the items relevant for love magic are numbered): *Athgabail treisi i folomrad do maírb, i cosait tuilche, i cum-sa dhunaid, im aíinne, im ecnadhach, imm on, im ainbed, im ebsuid, im marbhnáí narnaige, i folomrad catha, im chumíth nuascandaíl, i fubhaid each omain, i tabairt mic for maín i tech, i mir mend, im sarurraich mbain fri uatne, toirched tar apud ineoch in athbala, ecen mire, ben na tairic a gninu, [I] fuba nimda, [II] collud mbrethi, [III] im anchor auptha, [IV] mimir do cor do con, dant-mir do breith o fir besa ai, ‘Distress of three days’ [stay] for stripping the dead, for disturbing the meeting-hill, for quarrelling in a fort, for slandering, for satirizing, for a [visible] blemish, for a concealed blemish, for mutilating, for stripping the slain in battle, for circulating false reports, for scaring the timid, for carrying a boy on the back into a house, for the longed-for morsel, for the oath of a woman in childbirth, for getting a woman with child notwithstanding being forbidden when death ensues, violating a mad-woman, incapacitating a woman for her work, [I] bed witchcraft, [II] neglecting cohabitation, [III] carrying love charms, [IV] setting the charmed morsel for a dog, carrying away the hero’s morsel from the person to whom it belongs.

30. For a diplomatic edition, see CIH 890.38–891.4; on the fragment, see Breatnach, Companion, 272.

31. For the law text, see CIH 387.30–33; and for the glosses, CIH 387.34–388.17; on the fragment, see Breatnach, Companion, 287.

32. CIH 1692.15–37; see Breatnach, Companion, 272, 287. H. 3. 17, f. 660 has ‘O lux nostra’ (see note 12 above).
Version (b), the most extensive one, is translated in ALI. It is, however, necessary to make a fresh and literal translation of the relevant items. I give the various versions in synopsis. Small capitals represents law text written in majuscule in the manuscripts; gloss and commentary written in minuscule in the manuscripts is rendered in lower case.\(^{33}\)

The first item in the list of offences that deals with ‘supernatural arts’ is \textit{fubae n-imda}. ALI translates this item as ‘bed witchcraft’, but it literally means ‘the [supernatural] attack of a bed’.\(^{34}\) The meaning of this item in the law text is then explained in the glosses. There is only one gloss in version (a); versions (b) and (c) give the glosses in a different order. I list them below in the order of version (b).\(^{35}\)

\begin{itemize}
\item[I.] \textbf{FUBA NIMDA (a), FUBA NIMDA (b), FUBAE NIDMDA (c)}
\item[1.] \textit{i. pisoca isin lepaid} (b) \textit{i. pisoga isin lepuidh} (c)
\item[2.] \textit{i. a ndlegar eneclann} (b) \textit{i. i ndlegur eneclann} (c)
\item[3.] \textit{i. a ben do breith uad} (b) \textit{i. a ben do breith uada} (c)
\item[4.] \textit{[followed by i. froma uptha dus crossed out]} (b).i. in folusc (?) lige (?) (c)
\item[5.] \textit{i. conabi tualaiq nacha serchi} (a) \textit{i. conabi tualaiq lanamnus} (b) \textit{i. cunabi tualuig lanamnus} (c)
\item[6.] \textit{i. cnamcosait} (b) \textit{i. cnam cosuit} (c).\(^{36}\)
\end{itemize}

\section*{1. THE [SUPERNATURAL] ATTACK OF A BED}
\begin{itemize}
\item[1.] i.e. sorcery in the bed
\item[2.] i.e. for which honour-price is due
\item[3.] i.e. to take away a person’s wife from him
\item[4.] i.e. the testing of a charm/spell to find out\] (b); i.e. the \textit{folusc}-lying\? (c)
\item[5.] i.e. so that he is not able [to have sex with\] any partner (a) i.e. so that he is not able to have sexual intercourse (b, c)
\item[6.] i.e. the \textit{cosait}-bone.\(^{37}\)
\end{itemize}

\(^{33}\) Kelly, \textit{Guide}, 226, and plates 1–4. This layout is found in the case of Versions (b) and (c), but not in Version (a).

\(^{34}\) \textit{Fuba} is also mentioned in \textit{Cethairibhlicht atghabalae} as a ‘[supernatural] attack’ on horses (see Fergus Kelly, \textit{Early Irish farming: a study based mainly on the law-texts of the 7th and 8th centuries AD} (Dublin 1997) 174), but this is outside the scope of this article.

\(^{35}\) The correct order of the glosses in version (c) is: \textit{i. pisoga isin lepuidh} \textit{i. cnam cosuit} \textit{i. i ndlegur eneclann} \textit{i. a ben do breith uada} \textit{i. in folusc (?) lige (?)} \textit{i. cunabi tualuig lanamnus}.

\(^{36}\) For the law text, see CIH 891.2 (a); 387.31–32 (b); 1692.31 (c); for the glosses, see CIH 891.2 (a); 388.9–10 (b); 1692.31–32 (c).

\(^{37}\) My tentative translation is as literal as possible. I am deeply indebted to Fergus Kelly, who discussed my translations and interpretations of these difficult fragments with me. I am responsible for any errors.
What the glosses describe is in fact ‘negative love magic’, something we find in other European cultures as well. Someone may try to estrange marriage partners and this is purportedly done by ‘supernatural arts’. The third party may be a person who desires one partner of the couple or a rejected lover who tries to destroy the relationship. The third party may also be a professional in supernatural matters, hired by the person who expects to gain from the disruption of the relationship. Instead of a third party, the destructive agent may be one of the marriage partners. Women were allowed to have a divorce when their husband was impotent. One of the marriage partners might use ‘supernatural arts’ for this purpose. The third gloss appears to refer to a third party who wants to estrange the woman from the husband. Gloss 4 in version (b) seems to be misplaced; it has been crossed out and we will encounter it again in the context of the testing of a charm (see below, the glosses on item IV). The fifth gloss is present in all three versions and seems to imply that sorcery was believed to incapacitate the husband, and this may refer to ‘supernaturally’ induced impotence. What cnámcosait (gloss 6) means, is unclear. Cnám means ‘bone’, and it should be noted that the long list in the Old Irish law under discussion mentions as its second item i cosait tuilche, for disturbing the meeting hill (compare footnote 29). Cosait signifies ‘act of setting at variance; dispute, strife’. If the glosses use the same word, it seems as if the sorcery contains some kind of ‘bone [of] contention’. This is not certain: cnám means ‘gnawing’; the compound could also refer to complaining, nagging, and grumbling. This might refer to the complaints of the couple about their sexual life. On the basis of continental

40. The gloss here listed as 4—in folus lige—in version (c) is obscure to me.

41. CIH 386.20.

42. cp. cnaim cocaidh, mentioned in ACT 1315.8–9 and translated as ‘the bone of contention’ (A. M. Freeman (ed), Annala Connacht: the Annals of Connacht (A.D. 1224-1544) (Dublin 1944; repr. Dublin 1970) 234 n 2). An interesting instance of using bones for charms is mentioned in ALI i 200–03: bones from a churchyard are broken in order to use the marrow for charms (do upthaib), exemplified as concemn forocthorach. These glosses mention the ‘bone about which the combat (comrac) is fought’. Could there be a connection with the transgression of digging under a church, attributed to women and mentioned in the above-mentioned Law of Adomnán? These passages deserve more research but are beyond the scope of this study.

43. I am indebted to Liam Breatnach for this suggestion.
references to negative love magic, however, I suggest that primarily a bone is meant and that this bone might be an object placed in the bed, which may thus be literally the sorcery that is in the bed (gloss ¹). This is the implication of the order of the glosses in version (c), in which enam cosuit immediately follows gloss ¹, and thus explains what the sorcery in the bed consists of. Therefore, this bone may represent the material form of the attack on the bed (law item I). This object is then believed to create the sexual problems in the bed, i.e. the impotence that the man suffers from (gloss ³), the grounds of which the woman may demand a divorce (gloss ³).

Item II, translated as 'neglecting cohabitation’ in ALI, literally means ‘the destruction of birth’. It could very well be that this refers to abortion. At this point, we note that the penitentials in Latin literally refer to destroying (perdo, decipio) a birth (partus) when they describe abortion. It may be that abortion was on the mind of the person who wrote the law text. However, the glosses in versions (b) and (c) explain this transgression in a sexual way and connect item II with item I. Item II and its glosses are absent from version (a). Version (b) and (c) are given here in the order of (b):

44. For instance, Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims (845–82), discusses impotence which he believes to be caused by women who perform supernatural arts. Among things he mentions the bones of the dead. Catherine Rider (Magic and impotence, 31–38, esp. 33) points out that Hincmar gives more details than the literary sources he uses. The practice of placing objects in, under, or above the bed or in the bedroom that were supposed to induce impotence is mentioned in continental European sources. Marcellus 'Empiricus' of Bordeaux wrote between 395 and 410: Si quem voles per noctem cum femina coire non posse, pistillum coronatum sub lecto illius pone, 'If you wish someone to be unable to have intercourse with a woman at night, put a garlanded pestle under his bed' (ibid. 23–24). See also the widely circulated tract on impotence caused by maleficia, 'spells' (lit. 'evil deeds'), by Constantinus Africanus (†1087) in his Pantechne ('The total art'), or in Latin Liber pantegni. Constantine, who translated Arabic and Greek medical texts into Latin, appears to have been a Muslim who studied medicine in North Africa; later he became a christian and lived as a monk in Monte Cassino. Constantine mentions several objects that were believed to cause sexual harm. They were put in, above, under beds, above or under thresholds or were hidden elsewhere in houses, or on the sides of a road. For instance, the testicles and blood of a cock were put under a bed and needles used for the last care of the dead were stuck in a mattress or pillow. Mention is made of letters written in bat’s blood, and of nuts, acorns and beans—all these were believed to cause impotence (see G. Hoffmann, 'Beiträge zur Lehre von der durch Zauber verursachten Krankheit und ihrer Behandlung in der Medizin des Mittelalters', Janus 37 (1933) 129–44, 179–92, 211–20; H. E. Sigerist, 'Impotence as a result of witchcraft', in Essays in biology in honor of Herbert M. Evans (Berkeley & Los Angeles CA 1943) 541–46; Rider, Magic and impotence, 46, 215–28: see parts 1–3; and my forthcoming 'The power of words').

45. I am indebted to Kim McCone for this suggestion.

46. The order of version (c) is as follows: i. nemdol chuice ’na imda i. a lemad i. a edh fhasus...
II. — (a) COLLUD MBRETHI (b) COLLUG MBREITHE (c)

1. i.e. this results from the just-mentioned thing;
2. i.e. the taking of power or of [the ability to have] offspring (?);
3. i.e. the fines for the barring of procreation;
4. i.e. to render him impotent;
5. i.e. not going to her in her bed.

II. THE DESTRUCTION OF A BIRTH

1. i.e. the results from the just-mentioned thing;
2. i.e. the taking of power or [the ability to have] offspring (?);
3. i.e. the fines for the barring of procreation;
4. i.e. to render him impotent;
5. i.e. not going to her in her bed.

It is important to translate this item and its glosses literally. If we follow the published translation, we are inclined to identify the husband as the guilty party: he would be guilty of ‘neglecting cohabitation’ (the ALI translation of colludó mbrethi) and ‘listlessness’ (the ALI translation of aólemad).

De-side i.e. gabul cumung no clainne (b) i.e. na s. uairiata coimperta (c).

47. Sét is a unit of value; the plural form séd is here abbreviated. The transgression airiadad coimperta, ‘the barring of procreation’, also occurs in §§38–40 of the Old Irish law tract Bretha crólige ‘Judgements of blood-lying’, also part of Senchus Már and dated to the first half of the eighth century (D. A. Binchy, ‘Bretha crólige’, Ériu 12 (1938) 1–77: 1). Binchy (ibid. 66–67) explains that this transgression signifies ‘the incapacitation of either husband or wife for cohabitation by the act of a third party’. In this tract, this is caused by (bloody) injuries and the fines are to be paid by the third party. The text associates supernatural arts with death and women in §44: the baislecóaupta, ‘the basilisk of a charm/spell (epaid)’, is not entitled to nursing or to fines. The glosses explain the term etymologically as .i. óbenóbasaigesónechóiólluc ‘a woman who does to death somebody in a spot’ (ibid. 34–35), and as in piseogac, ‘the user of charms’ (ibid.). This item was taken over without the etymology and its death association in the Old Irish Triads of Ireland as benóaupthach (Kuno Meyer (ed. & tr.), The triads of Ireland, TLS 13 (Dublin & London 1906) 24), ‘a spell-[working] woman’.

48. For the law text, see CIH 387.32 (b); 1692.33 (c); for the glosses, see CIH 388.10–12 (b); 1692.33–34 (c).

49. The reading of (c) is different here: cumung means ‘narrow, constricted, close’, and gabul is ‘crotch’. The translators of ALI seem to have followed version (c) when they translate ‘a narrow passage for childbearing’ (181). This could indicate magic against women, resulting in vaginismus. This type of magic is seldom found in continental European accounts on impotence magic (see Rider, Magic and impotence, 164). I am not sure whether this is meant by the glossators, for the second part of the phrase does not fit with the first.

50. My translation is based on ALI.

51. ALI i 181.
seems to say something else. Item II on ‘the destruction of birth’ is explained as making it impossible for the couple to have offspring (glosses 2-3). The woman cannot conceive because the man has been rendered impotent (gloss 4). Because of this ailment, he does not go to her to have sex with her (gloss 5). Last but not least, it is a third party who does the damage, because the glossators connect this item with the previous one (gloss 1). The ‘just-mentioned thing’ that causes the harm may refer to item I, fuba n-imda, ‘the [supernatural] attack of a bed’, and/or to its last gloss the cosait-bone.

It is possible that this ‘supernatural transgression’ is also mentioned in a tract on marriage and divorce, from which citations are found in O’Davoren’s Glossary. Fuba is explained in this glossary as follows:

\[
\text{Fuba i.e. terrifying or undermining. Feis, i.e. lust, ut est \textit{fuba co fesaib}, i.e. terrifying him with charms, i.e. rendering him impotent, or to practise enchantments upon him.}^{53}
\]

Fuba or ‘attack’ is here explained as ‘frightening or intimidating’ (fubthad) or as ‘cutting off, deprivation or diminution (?)’ (fodiubadh). The glossator then mentions feis in the sense of ‘spending the night, coition’, which equals drúis, ‘lust’. Consequently, the glossator associates feis with fis (in the dative plural), ‘knowledge; occult knowledge’, which is the instrument with which the attack (fuba) and the frightening (fubthad) are done. Finally, the glossator mentions the result: the person attacked is made impotent. The instrument, (occult) knowledge presumably pertaining to sex or lust, is then identified as ‘sorcery’. The term for this, piseóga, is used in gloss ¹ of Item I for ‘sorcery in the bed’ as explanation for fubae n-imda, ‘the [supernatural] attack of a bed’.

Item III is only extant in version (b). In ALI it is translated as ‘carrying love charms’. Literally, however, we should translate ‘carrying charms (or spells)’. ‘Casting charms (or spells)’ is another possible translation, because ‘casting, throwing, plying, practising’ are further meanings of immarchor. We do not actually know whether these are in fact love charms, although the context seems to argue for it. The preceding items concern procreation, sexuality and sexual violence. Item III is glossed as follows:

52. Breatnach, Companion, 306. Here the offence is presumably not committed by a third party, but by a woman against her husband (cp. ibid. 136 n 142).

III. IMARCHOR AUPTHA (b)
¹ .i. cipe dogne (b)
² .i. letfiach ann o tiucfa fogal, 7 anfot sin uili (b) 54.

III. CARRYING/CASTING CHARMS/SPells
¹ i.e. whoever does so
² i.e. [he shall pay] 55 half fine for it where injury results: and all this is without evil intent. 56.

The glossators indicate that the carrying or casting of spells is a transgression for everybody (gloss ¹). They mention, however, a penalty only when the presence or the use of the charms turns out to be harmful and provided that the harm was done inadvertently or by negligence (anfot, gloss ²). These charms or spells are thus different from the ones described in items I–II, which were believed to be used as an attack and be harmful to procreation. Items I and II represent destructive supernatural arts; item III appears to refer to neutral or positive ‘supernatural arts’, which are nevertheless forbidden. This second gloss reminds us of the Hiberno-Latin penitentials that were milder of tone and penalty on supernatural arts performed ‘for love’.

Item IV, rendered in ALI as ‘setting a charmed morsel for a dog’, literally mentions ‘a bad or dangerous morsel’, which is given to a dog. 57 The glosses explain why and discuss the consequences. Gloss ¹, the only gloss that version (a) supplies, is absent from version (c). The order of the glosses on item IV in versions (b) and (c) is the same:

IV. MIMIR DO CHOR DO CHOIN (a), MIMIR DO COR DO COIN (b), MIMIR DO CHOR DO CHUIN (c)
¹ .i. promad auptha son dus i mbia aithi 7 a mbiat aminsí (a) i. da promad (b)
² .i. im smacht in coin l ineclaínn (b) i. im smacht in coin, l in eneclann (c)
³ .i. froma uptha dus inbud amainsí; lethdiri ind, uair ni fo fath marbhtha (b) i. fromha uptha inbu amhainsin, lethdire inu uair ni fo fath marbhtha (c)
⁴ .i. fromad felmais (b) i. froma felmais (c)
⁵ .i. fromad na pisoc, 7 anfot indethbiri he (b) i. froma na pisog, 7 anfot induthbire e (c) 58.

54. CIH 387.32 (text), 388.12–13 (glosses).
55. The phrase between brackets is added by the translators.
56. The translation of the law item is mine; the translation of the glosses is from ALI i 181.
58. For the law text, see CIH 891.2 (a); 387.32 (b); 1692.35 (c); for the glosses, see CIH.
IV. PUTTING/CASTING A BAD/DANGEROUS MORSEL FOR/TO A DOG

1 i.e. to test a charm (epaid), namely to find out whether there is swiftness in it and if there are supernatural crafts (amainsi) in it (a) i.e. to test it (b);
2 i.e. concerning the smacht-fine [for] the dog or the honour-price (b, c);
3 i.e. to test a charm/spell (epaid) to find out whether it has supernatural craft (amainse); half dire-fine for it, because it was not intentional that he was killed (b, c);
4 i.e. to test an enchantment (felmas, b, c);
5 i.e. to test the sorcery (pisóca), and it is the inadvertence of an unnecessary act (b, c). 59

The glossators appear to connect III and IV by using the term epaid, ‘charm, spell’, in the commentary on the bad morsel, which is part of III. Version (b) explicitly connects III and IV, by referring to epaid in III as ‘it’ in gloss ¹ on IV. The edible portion is qualified as something bad or dangerous; the glosses interpret this as something supernatural, referred to as amainse, ‘supernatural cunning or craft’, in gloss ¹ and gloss 3; epaid, ‘charm, spell’, in gloss ¹ and gloss ³; felmas, ‘enchantment, sorcery; a spell or a charm’, in gloss ⁴; and pisóca, ‘sorcery’, in gloss ⁵. By letting a dog eat the morsel, purportedly transformed by supernatural arts, someone tries to find out whether the transformation is effective and possesses supernatural craft (glosses ¹ ³). Apparently, people who perform such tests do not use their own dog but someone else’s. Hence, a fine is given to compensate for the damage in gloss ². Another fine based on the absence of the intention to kill is mentioned in gloss ³: the reason for the test was not to see whether the morsel was lethal but whether it worked in a different way, presumably whether the dog would be aroused to sexual acts. The last gloss concludes with the statement that people are inadvertent when they perform such an unnecessary act (gloss ⁵).

Item III thus states clearly that carrying or casting aipthi is an offence. Strictly speaking, we do not know at all whether love charms are meant, but the context seems to imply this. Whether these aipthi are objects or words, or whether words were written or spoken on such an object to transform it into a supernatural tool is also unclear. The commentary is not quite explicit on the illegal character of this act. It names a fine that is applicable only when this act causes harm. Moreover, the intention of the performer is presumed to be innocent. In other words, the commentary is more neutral on the use of charms. If items III and IV are indeed connected, as the glossators imply, we can be sure that an object is 891.2–3 (a); 388.13–15 (b); 1692.35–37 (c).

59. My translation, based on ALI.
meant, because it is something edible in IV. We do not know whether this object was made from parchment, herbs, mushrooms or something else or whether words were spoken to make the edible portion more powerful. The commentary describes the practice of experimenting with the dog as the guinea pig. It is too bad when the dog dies, because that was not the intention.\textsuperscript{60}

The second law text to be discussed here is part of the collection known as the Heptads or \textit{na Sechtae}, ‘the Sevens’. This collection is, as the previous text, included in \textit{Senchus mār} and consists of legal material arranged in sixty-five groups of seven. It was assembled in the Old Irish period.\textsuperscript{61} Heptad 52 deals with seven kinds of woman who were entitled to a divorce because of transgressions by their husbands.\textsuperscript{62} These women could leave their marriage whenever they wished\textsuperscript{63} and they might take their brideprice with them. There are two versions of the text extant: version (a) CIH 47.21–48.26, part of a continuous copy of the whole tract; and version (b) CIH 1848.11–36, a long extract from the original Old Irish text with later glosses and commentary.\textsuperscript{64} The law text and its commentary run as follows in version (a):

\begin{verbatim}
BEAN DIA TABAIR A CEILE UPTA OCA GUIDE CO MBEIR FOR DRUIS

. i. in inbaid bis aca cuingi is and dobeir na uptha do urail a seirci fuirre . i. coibchi 7 eiric fo aicne an cineoil uptha; re tiachtain a ndligi lanamnais tucadh di na uptha 7 a ndligi lanamnais tancar ria, 7 smacht lanamanda uaidhe and, 7 coibchi 7 eineclann 7 coirpdiri di, 7 imscar fri, 7 eiric fo aicned an cineoil uptha 7 a rogha di an imscarad \end{verbatim}

\textsuperscript{60} R. Kieckhefer, ‘Erotic magic in medieval Europe’, in J. E. Salisbury (ed), \textit{Sex in the middle ages: a book of essays} (New York & London 1991) 30–55: 37, discusses historical cases in which love charms appear to be dangerous. One, which actually was a murder attempt, took place in 14th-century France. An uncle gave his nephew powder, which he should sprinkle on his father’s food. His parents would be reconciled because of this but it had to be done secretly; otherwise it would not work. The father, the Count of Foix, discovered the powder and fed it to one of his dogs ‘which promptly expired in painful convulsions’ (B. W. Tuchman, \textit{The distant mirror: the calamitous 14th century} (London 1979) 344). The unfortunate boy did not live to see the end of the day either.

\textsuperscript{61} Kelly, \textit{Guide}, 266.

\textsuperscript{63} Ní Chonaill, ‘Impotence’, 9–10, 12, for further information on the time frame within which a woman might leave marriage.

\textsuperscript{64} Breatnach, \textit{Companion}, 97, 291.
dodena l⁶⁵ a ndligi lanamnus bias; 7 is e-sin an dara inadh isin berla a fuil smacht lanamanda o duine isin fogail dorige ria tiachtain a ndligi lanambnais.⁶⁶

'A WOMAN TO WHOM HER COMPANION GIVES/UTTERS A CHARM/SPELL WHEN SOLICITING HER, SO THAT HE BRINGS HER TO LUST i.e. when he is entreating her, it is then that he gives/utters the charms/spells to press his love upon her; i.e. bride price and éric-fine, according to the nature of the type of charm/spell; it was before entering the law of marriage that the charms/spells were given/uttered to her and it was in the law of marriage that they came to/against her (?); and the smacht-fine applicable to the marriage contract from him for it, and bride price and honour-price and body-fine to her; and separation from him; or éric-fine, according to the nature of the type of charm/spell and her choice to her whether it is mutual separation that she will do or it is in the law of marriage that she will be; and that is the second place in the language [of the Laws] in which there is smacht-fine applicable to the marriage contract [demanded] from a person for the damage he did before his entering the law of marriage'.⁶⁷

The law and its commentary are clear that by epaid a supernatural instrument is meant which was used for sexual arousal. We are not certain what kind of charm or spell is meant. Women were believed to be the victim of this supernatural art, men the ones who performed it in order to obtain sex. The commentary explains that men used these charms or spells in order to delude women into marrying

---

⁶⁵. The editor adds here: 'supply in?'.
⁶⁶. CIH 48.11–20. The reading in CIH 1848.29–36 (version (b) is BEAN DIA TABAIR A CEILI UPTHA i.e. an inbuidh his oca cuingid is and dobeir na upthta do fo aicned in cineoil uptha; ria toidhte a lanunnas tucadh di na upthta 7 a ndliged lanunnus tancotar ria, 7 smacht lanamhanda uadha and, 7 coihebe 7 eineclann 7 coirpdire di, 7 imscar fris, 7 eruic fo aicniudh in cineoil uptha, 7 a rogha di an iomgar dodena no 'n a ndliged lanunnus bias; 7 is e-sin in dara hinadh isin berladh a fuil smacht lanunnus o duine isin soidhnil [=foghail] dorindri ria tiachtain a ndliged lanambnais.

⁶⁷. My working translation is very literal. cp. ALI v 293, 295: 'a woman to whom her mate has administered a philtre when entreating her, so that he brings her to fornication, i.e. at the time that he was entreating her, he administered the philtres to press his love upon her, i.e. [he pays] dowry and ‘eric’, according to the nature of the philtre. It was before entering the law of marriage the philtres were given to her, and it is when in the law of marriage [the effect] became [apparent] upon her; and he pays the ‘smacht’-fine of cohabitation for it; and there are due dowry and honour-price and body-fine to her, and [liberty] to separate from him; or ‘eric’ according to the nature of the philtres, and she has her choice either to separate or to remain in the law of marriage. And this is the second place in the Brehon law in which there is ‘smacht’ fine of cohabitation paid by a person for the damage he did before coming into the law of marriage.'
them. If such a woman discovered the deception afterwards, she might leave the marriage and take her dowry and fines with her.68

These two law tracts thus forbid the use and possession of aipthi. The second, heptad 52, refers to men as the performers and women as the ones who become ‘enchanted’. The first law tract, discussed above, is not clear on the gender of the performers. The commentaries seem more lenient on the use of these charms or spells than do the law texts. The commentaries seem to forbid abuse in order to ensure that charms or spells (aipthi) should be safe: no injury should come from them, either to people or to dogs. Nor should they be used to lure someone into marriage. Perhaps they keep open the possibility of safe aphrodisiacs, used by consenting partners within marriage.

III. CONCLUSION

Looking at both ecclesiastical and legal rules, I conclude that medieval Irish were familiar with positive and negative love magic. Positive love magic, referred to as maleficium and epaid, is mentioned in the penitentials of Finnian, and Columbanus, the Heptads, and probably in Cethairshlíc hthathgabálae as item III. This supernatural instrument believed to induce love was not without risk: the glosses on item IV of Cethairshlíc hthathgabálae discuss the fines when death ensues from experimenting with such a charm (epaid). The risk, or perhaps even the aim to kill, accomplished by administering an epaid is also found in the Old Irish penitential and in Cáin Adomnán. Both texts also refer to poison (tonnad, neim) as a secret way to kill. Abortion is found in the same context as love magic in the penitentials; and that of Columbanus connects abortion with the result of successful positive love magic. The Old Irish penitential likewise mentions abortion in the same context as the use of dangerous charms/spells. Cethairshlíc hthathgabálae forbids the destruction of a birth, using an expression similar to that of the two Hiberno-Latin penitentials do when they describe abortion. This law item II is, however, explained as negative love magic by the glosses that link it up with item I (the [supernatural] attack of a bed). The glosses to these two items describe impotence magic, performed by a third party, because of which the man becomes incapable of having sex with his wife. There will be no offspring and she may have a divorce. It is possible that the glosses imply that a bone put in the bed causes the man to lose his sexual potency.

Whether item III, the interdiction on carrying or uttering charms, really refers to love magic is uncertain, but we saw that the term epaid is used to refer to love magic in the Heptads. This term for love magic also occurs in the literary exam-pies.\(^6\) Epaid is, however, like maleficium and pharmakon, a generic term for ‘charm’ or ‘spell’. Therefore, we should always keep open the possibility that it refers to something more general than love magic alone.

\(^{69}\) See my forthcoming ‘The power of words’.