Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude Reconsidered
Kolfin, E.E.P.

Published in:
Print Quarterly

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: http://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.
Contents

Alessandro Gandini: Uncovering the Identity of a Chiaroscuro Woodcutter
JAN JOHNSON 3

The Print Drawer of the Coaci Inkstand
JANE IMMLER SATKOWSKI 14

RACHEL SAUNDERS 23

Shorter Notices

Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude Reconsidered
ELMER KOLFIN 39

Whatever is Coveted will be Forged –
Forgers Set Their Sights on Contemporary Prints
HUBERTUS BUTIN 44

Notes

Catalogue and Book Reviews

Antonio Lafreri’s Religious Prints
ECKHARD LEUSCHNER 87

The Business of Prints in Amsterdam’s Golden Age
JACO RUTGERS 90

Pierre Lepautre (1652–1716)
PETER FUHRING 93

The Efflorescence of French and English Caricature
JAMES CUNO 96

The Strobridge Company’s Circus Posters
NANCY FINLAY 99

Peter Blake: One Man Show
BEN THOMAS 103

Markus Raetz
LAUREN LAZ 106

Print/Out: 20 Years in Print
RONI FEINSTEIN 109

Paula Rego
SUE HUBBARD 112
NO. | TITLE | PUBLICATION DATE | TECHNIQUE
---|---|---|---
115 | Jinsei no mon | 1 March 1978 | Relief karen print
116 | Airan no koi | 8 November 1978 | Gold foil stencil
117 | Rui to Kanna | 8 October 1978 | Pufboard printing
118 | Sode no shita | 20 January 1979 | Self-carved woodblock karen print
119 | Erihanahime to chô | 1 March 1979 | Arumina Porcelain (photolithography on ceramic)
120 | Hanatatsu to tanuki | 1 April 1979 | Three-colour relief printing
121 | Shafu Mangoro | 15 May 1979 | Two-colour relief printing
122 | Chinchikurin no mikoto | 23 June 1979 | Two-colour relief printing
123 | Bangasa kidan | 15 August 1979 | Pufboard printing
124 | Kakei to seko | 20 September 1979 | Two-colour relief printing
125 | Shin no maho | 20 October 1979 | Self-carved woodblock karen print
126 | Berabô monogatari | 25 June 1980 | Heat embossing
127 | Kato Kiyouma | 10 October 1980 | Three-colour relief printing
128 | Kadara no senrin | 1 March 1981 | Monochrome relief print
129 | Rejo nesai | 12 December 1980 | Self-carved woodblock karen print
130 | Tsuki kara kita ko | 30 March 1981 | Intaglio gold line printing
131 | Senju Kanon | 5 May 1981 | Unspecified (letterpress)
132 | Tôkaritsueinon no tsuna | 3 November 1981 | Self-carved woodblock karen print
133 | Fujin to raizin | 10 March 1982 | Bullrush-leaf paper, relief print
134 | Kagyohime gojitsu | 10 October 1982 | Three-colour relief printing
135 | Tsuribane ibun | 25 June 1982 | Colour cloud paper, relief printing
136 | Ionageki | 15 August 1982 | All stamping
137 | ABC Youa | 3 November 1982 | Self-carved woodblock karen print
138 | Toritsukai to osome | 11 February 1983 | Laser cut
139 | Tenjiku no tori | 20 April 1983 | Indian paper, two-colour relief printing

Shorter Notices

Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude Reconsidered

Elmer Kolfin

‘Un effet de sa bizarrerie ordinaire’ was how Pierre Jean Mariette interpreted the darkness in Rembrandt’s print commonly known as Negress Lying Down (Bartsch 205, fig. 36, inv. RP-P-OB 428). The title was first noted by Adam von Bartsch in 1797. Ever since, there has been doubt as to the woman’s racial identity, a matter that gained some urgency with the growing interest in blacks in art since the 1970s. Mariette and others before Bartsch saw a white women in the shade. The new title was given in a period with much artistic interest in blacks. The abolitionist movement had just discovered the power of the printed image. One year before Bartsch’s catalogue was published, William Blake’s prints of slaves appeared in John Gabriel Stedman’s soon-to-be famous Narrative of a Five Years’ Expedition Against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam. Blacks were also becoming popular subjects in painting. Quite possibly this interest inspired the new interpretation of the woman in Rembrandt’s print as African.

I would like to thank Paul Kaplan and Erik Hinterding for their useful suggestions.

In 1731, 1735 and 1755 the print was called The Sleeping Woman, Sleeping Women [sic] and A Nude Sleeping Woman with Naked Buttocks. In 1679 the plate, now at the British Museum, was identified as Sleeping Nude Woman. As a rule, descriptions in seventeenth-century probate inventories drew attention to what was regarded as the most characteristic feature of the image. When blacks were the single subject of an image, it would usually be described as ‘a moor’ or ‘a black’. For example, in Rembrandt’s own inventory of 1656, his painting of two Africans was listed as Two Moors.

3. One year before Bartsch published his catalogue, the print was called A Naked Woman Seen from Behind in Rembrandt’s Dark Manner in D. Daulby, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Works of Rembrandt, and of his Scholars, Bol, Livens, and Van Vliet, Compiled from the Original Engravings, and from the Catalogues of De Burgy, Gersaint, Helle & Glomy, Marcus & Yver, Liverpool, 1796, p. 129, no. 197. Rembrandt’s first cataloguer called it Une autre femme nue, aussi couchée sur un lit, see E. F. Gersaint, Catalogue raisonné de toutes les pieces qui forment l’œuvre de Rembrandt, Paris, 1751, p. 160, no. 197.

7. Sale catalogue De Burgy, 1755, nos. 550–55 (different states and variations); sale catalogue Van Huls, 1735, no. 1008; inventory of Valerius Rover, 1731; all quoted in Hinterding, op. cit., p. 375, notes 1 and 2.

36. Rembrandt, Reclining Nude, 1658, etching, drypoint and burin, second state, 81 x 158 mm (Amsterdam, Rijksmuseum, Rijksprentenkabinet).
Therefore it is significant that his Reclining Woman was not called Black Woman Lying Down but Sleeping Nude Woman. Evidently in 1679 the woman was not seen as black.

Reclining Nude is dated 1658 and it is useful to look at Rembrandt’s other prints of the time. The print shows a woman lying on a mattress; the dark background suggests a confined space like the bed in Woman with the Arrow, of 1661, or Antiope and Jupiter from 1659 (Bartsch 202 and 203). If we add to this little series his Woman at a Brook (Bartsch 200) from 1658 it becomes clear that Rembrandt was experimenting with nude white women and shadow in narrowly confined spaces. Woman at the Stove and Woman with the Hat, both from 1658, show the same interest (Bartsch 197 and 199). In every print the artist situates the woman differently vis-à-vis the shadow and light. In Woman at a Brook she is placed in front of a dark background, her right side in a soft shadow. Antiope and Jupiter shows a more bold play of light and an extremely velvety shadow on legs, hips and belly. In Woman with the Arrow she is on the verge of light and shade; half shadows define her back while a strong light throws the side of her body into sharp silhouette. Chronologically, Reclining Nude falls between Woman at a Brook and Jupiter and Antiope, between the refined print and the more daring experiment. In this context it does not seem illogical to see the woman as a white model in a situation that seems straightforward, but that is extremely difficult to depict because the subject is fully in the shadow. Had she been a black model, Rembrandt would have created a completely new situation.

37. Anonymous artist, Reclining Nude Seen from Behind, 1658, black and white chalk on blue paper, 234 x 315 mm (formerly Amsterdam, Paul Brandt).

Interestingly, there exists an anonymous drawing depicting a Reclining Nude Seen from Behind that has not been related to Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude, but seems to be connected to it (fig. 37). It is alternatively attributed to Rembrandt’s pupils Ferdinand Bol and Govert Flinck. Jacob Backer was also recently suggested. The woman in the drawing is posed slightly more diagonally; she is more curvaceous, we see her ear and hair, but not her right foot. She is in full light, which falls in from the left. Reclining Nude Seen from Behind is generally seen as the result of a session of life drawing on 27 July 1658 that included both Bol and Flinck, in the same year that Rembrandt dated his Reclining Nude print.11 If he was indeed present, the white girl in fig. 37 might actually be the same model as in the print. A situation comes to mind like the one depicted in Constantijn Daniel van Renesse’s drawing Rembrandt and his Pupils Drawing from a Nude Model of c. 1650 (fig. 38), except that the 1658 session would have involved Rembrandt and ex-pupils who by then had gone their own way and whose style differed from that of the master. Possibly the relationship between Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude and the anonymous Reclining Nude Seen from Behind is comparable to that between the etching of Male Nudes, Seated and Standing – the Walking Trainer (Bartsch 194) and drawings by Carel Fabritius, Samuel van Hoogstraten and an unknown pupil of circa 1646.12 A similar example dates from 1661, with Rembrandt creating his Woman with the Arrow (Bartsch 202) and Johannes Raven making a drawing of a seated female nude.13 In all cases the pupils were working on paper, while Rembrandt was drawing directly on a copperplate; he introduced new features at a later stage: the background with the walking trainer in Bartsch 194, the face of Cupid in Bartsch 202 and the strong shadow on the woman’s body in Bartsch 205.

Only one impression of the first state of Rembrandt’s Reclining Nude exists. It was poorly inked and has the appearance of a proof, even though it was printed on Japanese paper.14 If Rembrandt indeed worked on the plate in front of a live model this print may be the result of that session. The image is not very appealing, for it lacks ‘force’, a seventeenth-century term that denoted a strong relief resulting from a play of light and shadow and situating the figure firmly in space. Her back is still too flat, the anatomy of the right hip is awkward and she is lying rather squarely in front of the shadow rather than being enveloped by it. This is not what Rembrandt would have been after.

Rembrandt finally achieved the desired effect of a body lying in shadow through etching and drypoint, with a dense pattern of delicate hatching and cross-hatching. Dark areas were given extra ‘force’ with the burin. In the final blend, the different techniques are almost impossible to distinguish. This in itself already signals workmanship of the highest quality. But the true magic comes with the inking, wiping and printing of the plate.15 Rembrandt did not wipe the plate clean overall, but left thin films of ink in places that show up in the final print as subtle tonal fields of light grey, almost as a translucent wash applied with the brush. He also used varying types of paper and different effects. As a result, each print is unique. Very dark copies exist, but also relatively light ones.

Caps of the kind the woman is wearing were bright white, as they appear in other etchings by Rembrandt from this time, such as the Sitting Nude Beside a Chair with a Hat, of 1658 (Bartsch 199). In Reclining Nude the cap is not rendered white, so the head must be in the shadow. The tonality of the cap is comparable to that of the woman’s side. If the cap is white, it seems reasonable to assume the body is white and also in the shadow. The wider spaced cross-hatching makes the cap slightly lighter in places, suggesting its texture and intense whiteness.

Also revealing is the woman’s face, of which we see a small part at the temple. In most copies this spot was not inked, so that it would print white. Its function is to... separate the dark hair or the shadow in the neck from the slightly hunched shoulder and the background. This entire part would be blurred if Rembrandt had made this little spot dark too, which he would have had to do if he intended the woman to be black.

Rembrandt made seven prints with black people, all dating between 1630 and 1652. In most of these he did not indicate the darkness of the skin, but rather relied on the physiognomy to suggest the figures’ African identity. Only the soldier in Ecce Homo from 1636 and the servant in the Beheading of John the Baptist from 1640 have a light hatching that suggests a brown tone (Bartsch 77 and 92). Rembrandt stubbornly adhered to the convention of depicting telling physical features to indicate African heritage that went back to Albrecht Dürer, Lucas van Leyden and Hendrick Goltzius. His contemporaries, like Lucas Vorsterman and Wenceslaus Hollar, were at the same time looking for ways to depict dark skin convincingly in print, with careful, often dense patterns of hatching and cross-hatching. In this context a reclining black woman would certainly be a late, unexpected and unique response. A reclining white nude in the semi-dark, however, fits neatly with Rembrandt’s experiments with the effect of shadow in the 1650s that resulted in so many extraordinary prints.

38. Constantijn Daniël van Renesse, Rembrandt and his Pupils Drawing from a Nude Model, c. 1650, black chalk, brush and brown wash heightened with white, 180 x 266 mm (Darmstadt, Hessisches Landesmuseum).

16. Bust of a Black Woman, c. 1630 (Bartsch 357), Ecce Homo, 1636 (Bartsch 77); The Decapitation of St John the Baptist, 1640 (Bartsch 92); The Baptism of the Eunuch, 1641 (Bartsch 98); The Large Lion Hunt, 1641 (Bartsch 114); The Preaching of Christ, c. 1639–49 (Bartsch 74) and Christ among the Doctors, 1652 (Bartsch 65).