After having spent four years toiling over a dissertation on a daily basis and one year on an ad hoc basis, writing an acknowledgement should be easy. Ha. Two pages of my dissertation are nothing compared to these two pages. You know that many people actually read these pages, along with the summary. Initially, you are also saddled with the burden of possibly forgetting to thank someone. Soon afterwards, you accept that thanking everyone requires writing another book. Indeed, writing a PhD thesis may sometimes feel like an individual journey, but the list of people who contributed to my development as a scholar and a policy maker is long.

First, I want to thank my supervisors Brian Burgoo n, Erik de Gier and Bernhard Kittel for their continued support and knowledgeable insights over the years. Brian, your inspiring course gave a crucial boost to my curiosity about welfare state development and got me interested in writing a dissertation in the first place. Whether I wanted to submit a research proposal to the Amsterdam School for Social Science Research (ASSR, nowadays the Amsterdam Institute for Social Science Research) or discuss life after a PhD, you were always there to help and encourage me. Erik, nothing less applies to you. Moreover, I would like to thank you for emphasizing the societal contribution at which social science research should aim. Bernhard, above all, I have come to know you as a dedicated supervisor who has played a decisive role in various stages of my research by making seemingly simple comments that led me to think through and improve the general argument. Further, I am grateful for opening many doors in Austria and Germany, not least the door of your own apartment in Vienna where I could stay over for nearly two months.

I was lucky enough to be part of two different tracks at the University of Amsterdam: the ASSR and the Governance as Learning Program. At the ASSR, a special thanks to my friend and wedding arranger Ward Berenschot, the International Political Economy PhD club, Jos de Beus, Annette Freyberg-Inan and Philip van Praag for academic advice and inspiration, the secretariat including Anneke, Miriam, Hermance and Teun; Hans and José, and many friends and fellow PhD students, including Alexandru, Corina, Christian, Damian, Deasy, Helmy, Hester, Imrat, Jasper, Leang, Luc, Marlous, Mihai, Silke, Victor and many more.

At the Governance as Learning Program, thanks to Jelle Visser for having faith in my capabilities, sending me to the US to learn more about European social policy and introducing me to many inspiring people like Marc van der Meer. Anton Hemerijck, thank you for all our stimulating discussions and the great work experience at the Scientific Council for Government Policy. Jonathan Zeitlin, my trip as a visiting scholar to the University of Wisconsin-Madison has far exceeded my expectations. I am grateful for all your generosity with time, and prompt and constructive feedback, also after having returned to Amsterdam. My fellow PhD students and friends Bart, Birgitte, Nynke, Minna, Peter and Rob thanks for everything.

I would like to express my special thanks to Jens Alber, Peter Biegelbauer, Bernhard Ebbinghaus and Reinhart Schneider for offering me the opportunity to reside as a visiting scholar at the Institute of Higher Education in Vienna, the Mannheim Center of European Social Policy and the Science Center Berlin.

Thank you to all the interviewees, who willingly shared time with me and offered assistance and crucial insights. Without you, this book could not have been written. I owe you enormous debt for giving me a pleasant, guided tour through the black box of intraparty politics and the maze of welfare state reform. You may not agree with everything I have written and surely will not find all the information you handed to me. As such, the responsibility of any errors or omissions is mine.

At times, it was not easy to have a life outside academia, and I have not always spent as much time with family and friends as I would have liked. Yet, you all helped to keep me going. Despite the fact that many of you do not (fully) understand what I have been doing, you all believe that I am doing something great.

However, my deepest gratitude goes to my parents and my wife Kátia for their love and support, and to Antônio. Even though Antônio still has to learn to talk, all of you have taught me that there are much more important things in life than work.
