My first words of thanks go to my supervisors, Meindert Fennema and Jean Tillie. Both encouraged me to engage in doctoral research and have made it possible for me to begin doing so with their confidence in my abilities and their endeavours to finance this project. What is more, in the role of supervisor, they have given me as much room and freedom as I desired and needed, while nevertheless carefully watching over my work. They have also jointly guarded the process, each with his own voice: Jean’s precision and Meindert’s creativity. Both have have been as demanding as supervisors should be and as friendly, interested and understanding as colleagues – or even friends – can be. I couldn’t have wished for better supervision!

It was thanks to Meindert Fennema that I got in touch with Brieuc-Yves Cadat, who introduced me to his study of ethnic minority politicians, the topic I have worked on for many years and still find fascinating. By making available to me the interviews that he had obtained for his doctoral research in the early 1990s, Brieuc-Yves has made it possible for me to create a unique research design and I am grateful to him for that.

My journey into the writing of this dissertation started for real in 2005 when I was given the chance to join the doctoral programme of the European University Institute in Florence. My work has greatly benefitted from the year I spent there, the contact I have had with fellow PhD students, the fine working conditions, the high-quality seminars and the critical feedback from many people at the EUI. I particularly want to thank Virginie Guiraudon and Martin Kohli for their supervision during that year; they have opened up new pathways for me and their comments and advice have helped enormously in improving my original thoughts.

In 2006, I joined the Department of Political Science and the Institute for Migration and Ethnic Studies (IMES) of the University of Amsterdam, since the present research project was funded by the Nederlandse Organisatie voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek (the Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research, NWO). Coming back to the place where I had studied and worked as a research assistant was a privilege and a pleasure. The IMES board (Jan Rath, Jean Tillie and Hanneke Grotenbreg) ensured that I could conduct this research project in excellent conditions, while the secretaries of both IMES and the Department of Political Science have made my work a great deal easier. I would like to thank all of my colleagues for the stimulating and convivial environment I have worked in. The support and interest from fellow PhD-students and our constructive discussions were particularly valuable to me. I have, however, been more closely in touch with two people at IMES: Anja van Heelsum, with whom I shared a room, and Floris Vermeulen, with whom I developed common research interests. I am grateful to both for the many – long and amiable – chats that we have had and for enabling me to share my excitement (or doubts…) with them.

My guest stay at the Centre de Recherches Politiques de Sciences Po Paris (CEVIPOF) in June and July 2008 was invaluable in many respects. I am indebted to its director, Pascal Perrineau, who made this stay possible, to the entire staff for their support and the excellent infrastructure, and to Madani Cheurfa, Jean Chiche, Claude Dargent, Elisabeth Dupoirier, Florence Haegel and, in particular, Vincent Tiberj for sharing their expertise and for their help.
I would also like to thank all of the interviewees in Amsterdam and Paris and the Paris region for their cooperation and for telling me the story of their (political) lives. I tremendously enjoyed doing the fieldwork and meeting so many fascinating personalities!

Sally-Ann Ross has edited the manuscript of this dissertation with care; it was a pleasure working with her on it. I am grateful to her for improving my work while still making it possible for me to fully recognize myself in it.

I will end these words of thanks on a more personal note, by revealing my appreciation for my friends, in particular Amber Davis, Froukje Demant, Ellis Doeven, Eelke Heemskerk, Dennis Janssen, Corinne Noordenbos and Cécile Wendling (sorry for those I cannot name here!) for the many happy moments and for their support and advice. In the final stage, I would have been lost without Ellis, who has designed the cover of this book (I very much enjoyed sharing this creative process with her!) and Krischan Sjauw and my sister Sarah, whose help and advice for the layout have been crucial.

This brings me to my close family. The ambitions, self-confidence and strong will of my parents, Marjolein Langerijs and Antoine Michon, explain much of what I have achieved. I am deeply grateful for what they have done to give me a good start in life and for their interest and encouragement over the years. I also wish to express my gratitude to my dear sisters, Elaine and Sarah. Both have been extremely supportive and have also helped me to keep my feet on the ground! Finally: Mustapha’s role in my life, and this dissertation, is invaluable, but he argues that why and how I express my thankfulness are private matters. So it is!
