This thesis is a result of a long process in which its components were developed and produced. The positive aspect of this process is that many ongoing developments could be incorporated in the contents. And this is what remains as the main message from this work and which I will keep as a stimulus for further work.

My first and most important thanks go to Niek Klazinga, my promoter. I first attended his lectures in a summer course at the Netherlands Institute for Health Sciences in Rotterdam in 1996. And it was his lecture on health workforce planning that actually stimulated me to start my Master of Science studies there in 1998. It seemed then almost ‘normal’ to pursue down the same road towards a PhD. With his clear thoughts, friendly atmosphere that he creates in the interaction, but in particular with his sharp comments and wise steering and guidance his student can only learn and move forward. Most importantly his approach leads to students developing own research skills, which is definitely the most important goal from postgraduate studies. He was supporting me and encouraging me throughout this long process and I am grateful that we have managed to achieve this common goal.

I then thank my Institute, the National Institute of Public Health of Slovenia, where I have been working since 1992 and where all of my research efforts took place. Special thanks go to all the directors of the Institute, Metka Macarol Hiti, Andrej Marušič, Ada Hočevar Grom, Nina Pirnat and Marija Seljak, who all supported me and provided me with the excellent opportunity to be able to study in such an exciting and challenging environment. I wish to thank my closest colleagues.
working on health systems and health policy issues, especially my junior colleague, Rade Pribaković Brinovec, who helped me out by ever so often taking over a lot of the workload and by being available for frequent fruitful and challenging discussions and for providing useful tips and remarks.

Finally, last, but by far not least, I want to thank my family, especially my parents, mother Marija and father Roman, but he, unfortunately, did not live to see this day, then all the people I love and cherish and who were close to me in the making of this thesis for believing in me and for understanding the efforts needed and the goal that needed to be achieved. I would like to thank you all for being there and for having supported me also when things did not look at their best. Your thoughts of support enabled me to move forward.
