I'm not quite sure if getting your PhD is the end or the start of something, a finish line or a four-year long right of passage. If it's the start, then it has surely been a long driveway leading onto the even longer road that is academia. Luckily, long driveways usually come with beautiful gardens. Similarly, the past years have been quite a ride, but mostly a beautiful one! And while these gates close (the gates of long driveways, as you know, always close very slowly), it's probably a good moment to look back at the people in the garden who have inspired me along the way.

I want to start by thanking Tom van der Meer, Theresa Kuhn, Alessandro Nai, Dominique Wirz, and Vin Arcenaux for serving on my defense committee. I also want to thank Vin for having served as external reader on my first year paper many years ago and providing feedback on some of the earliest ideas. Generally, I am grateful for everyone who has provided feedback on my work at various stages, there are too many to list them all.

I want to thank Gijs, the one person without whom this dissertation wouldn't have happened or would have looked very different. Throughout these years, you've been supportive, yet critical, and, above all, sympathetic to my occasional stubbornness when I refused to see the value of your critiques. I've valued your honesty, sharp mind, and sometimes unconventional sense of humor. I've learnt a lot from you, and I hope you've learnt something from me too, besides where to get the best ice cream in Vienna, or how to write extremely long sentences.

Matthijs, you would have gotten an honorary mention as a standout colleague, known for always having a smile on your face, your friendly hallway banter and a willingness to engage with others' work in the most constructive and encouraging way. I am very happy that you eventually brought these qualities into my supervision team and helped me to genuinely enjoy wrapping up this dissertation!

I want to thank the whole Hot Politics Lab, its members and friends! I am grateful to have seen it grow from five of us in a windowless room discussing rough research ideas to a global community held together by Friday afternoon beers but most of all a love for research. Thanks to those who have been integral parts of it: Bert, Maaïke, Diamantis, Mariken! A huge thank you to Amanda Friesen, who during and following her visit became a co-author, mentor, and friend. Thank you for filling all of these roles simultaneously, and for introducing me to the Indigo Girls!

Thank you to all of the great colleagues of the Challenges research group for your valuable feedback and support. Thank you to Theresa, Daphne, Wouter, Johan, Enzo, Eefje, Eelco and many more for lunch, coffee, or hallway chats and for providing a friendly and inspiring workplace.

Thank you to the wonderful Challenges PhDs for countless lunch and ping pong breaks, coffee trains, and Kaffeklatsches. Thank you to the many PhD students who visited us and brought a breeze of fresh air into B10. Especially Lennart, for inspiring me to take the stairs every once in a while. I might live a little bit longer and it's because of you. Thank you, Ugur, for our smoke breaks. I might live a little bit shorter because of you, but it was worth it! Christian, you never let me win at ping pong and although I'm a sore loser, there's few things in Amsterdam that I miss as much as our daily ping pong sessions. Philipp, thank you for the occasional night out to take our minds off of the stress of academia, to many more! And thank you both for serving as my paranymphs! Thanks to Ebe for having been a companion from the very start. To Sanne, and her family, for so generously taking me in when locked-down Amsterdam was quite a lonely place. Ellis, thank you for being my coffee walk partner and for becoming my first Dutch friend. One reason for continuing on this road is the prospect of countless more coffee walks with you all over the world!

And what about the house I departed from (pretty naive if you thought I was done with the driveway metaphor)? Thank you, Lara and Fer, for being my home in Amsterdam, I miss you and our little house every day! Thank you to my friends back home, in Berlin, Brussels, Frankfurt, and Kuwait, for being smart and kind and funny, for giving me plenty to miss when I was not with you, and plenty of distractions when I was. Thank you to my parents for supporting my studies and (not always humble) lifestyle of my twenties, for passing on some of your brains to me, and for getting me interested in politics in the first place.
