Acknowledgements

First and foremost I thank my promotor Peter Sloot, who at first appearance let me swim in freedom, only to discover in the end that it was part of a bigger plan. Every now and then he nudged me in the right direction – the greatest of which was the switch from epidemiology to the current mixture of statistical mechanics and information theory, almost halfway into my promotion. I am particularly grateful for this change because I feel more at home with the new direction. The rest of the time I worked on my own, swimming in a turmoil of thoughts and ideas – some wrong, most incoherent, and too numerous altogether. How Peter is teaching me to organize my ideas and to communicate them clearly is still a mystery to me, though surely I will discover a plan later.

I thank all my fellow Ph.D. students in the group for a great atmosphere, for the many extra-curricular activities, and for tolerating my daily timetable for coffee and lunch. I feel we are more friends than colleagues. Chinh, thank you for all your dry humor and a shared interest in a beer or two. Emiliano, thank you for your wisdom and advice, whether I ask for it or not. You truly keep silence to a minimum. Gokhan, thank you for creating my stereotype image of an Utrechtnaar.

I also thank my family and friends, who continue to train me in explaining my work in laymen terms. I am not very good at it yet, but somehow they are still confident that I am good at what I do, whatever it may be. Lastly I thank Martine, without the love and care of whom I may never have reached this point. She knew before I did that an academic career is the right path for me, fully supporting me in pursuing it, while not letting me drown in it.
