Acknowledgements

A few words of thanks are due to all those people who made the writing of this book possible.

For some reasons, it is usual practice among academics to mention family members at the end of the acknowledgement section. Perhaps a closing sentence would sound more impressive, but I just think it wouldn't do the job right. First of all, I would like to thank my parents and my brother Fabio for their unconditional support throughout all these years, the many ways in which they have always encouraged me to pursue my studies and their positive attitude towards life. I read every day about educational opportunities and I appreciate – now more than ever – how their parenting made me feel cherished and gave me the confidence to aim high. My Dad even wanted to help me in collecting the data and spent a whole day searching for recruiters in my town and the one nearby. A week later, when he picked me up at the airport, he was proudly waving a handful of business cards. Although I did not include those contacts in my sample, his help soothed away all my frustration for a low response rate.

I am deeply grateful to my promoters for the thoroughness of their supervision, their timely and extensive feedback on my work in progress and their guidance at any stage of the PhD trajectory. Herman, Klarita: I have learned a lot from both of you and truly enjoyed our collaboration during these years. I drew from your work and I hope I was successful in bringing organizations within the scope of comparative research on education systems. Herman, I was hooked to the topic of education since the very first lecture you gave when I was a Master's student. You have always been extremely generous in giving me comments and suggestions and I have always felt motivated by your positive working attitude. You have always encouraged me and the other PhD's to present our work abroad, seek collaborations, get in contact with experts in the field. I am now a more self-confident researcher. Klarita, our meetings never lasted less than two hours: every time I was inspired by your clearheaded thinking and attention to details, which surely made me a more careful reader, writer and thinker. Countless times I thought “I can't write it this way: Klarita will pick up on it!”. From you I learned to look at my own work more critically.

My PhD trajectory was enjoyable since the very beginning. In February 2009, at the introductory evening for the new cohort of PhDs I met Paul, I sneakily managed to sit next to him at the dinner table, and I never left that seat. Vanne, in usual acknowledgements your place would also be close to the end, but I believe you deserve to be upfront. We shared almost every single moment of our PhDs. Before meeting you, I didn't think it was even possible to be as passionate as you are in the study of a subject. Your passion for what you do is consuming, overwhelming, and contagious. I look forward to sharing many more meals at this table, discussing De Gaulle, nuclear deterrence, or education systems.

While writing this book, I benefited a lot from an intellectually stimulating environment. I would like to thank all the current and former members of the programme group Institutions, Inequalities and Life Courses for the many exchanges we had during our seminars, but also while playing bowling, riding wind carts on the beach, or during volleyball matches. We’re not only a very cohesive group: we also organize the funniest outings. I am very happy that I will keep working in close contact with you for the next two years. In particular, I would like to thank Thijs for the support we gave to each other at all stages of our PhD. Thijs, I learned a lot from you and sooner or later I promise I will get down to our social closure paper!

My work in progress has also been discussed during various meetings of the “IPE Club”. In particular, I am indebted to Brian Burgoon and Annette Freyberg-Inan for their dedication to the training of PhD students: Annette, Brian, there are few scholars with such a true vocation for teaching and I am very grateful for your coaching during the Methodology Clinic.

This research was completed at the Amsterdam Institute for Social Science Research (AISSR). Many people there made the ups and downs of writing a dissertation more enjoyable. In particular, I would like to thank: Alex, Apostolos, Carla, Federico, Jacqueline, Jasper, Julia, Luc, Lutz, Mihai, Malini, Marii, Marten, Martin, Matthijs, Sander, Sarah, Sylvia. And I am sure I am forgetting someone.

The research described in this dissertation would not have been possible without the cooperation of all the HR professionals who accepted to be interviewed or to complete the survey. I am also grateful to David Macro and Tyler Simpson for their technical assistance. Elisa Cominato helped me with the layout of the book and the cover page.

In my research, I focus on the payoff of education on the labour market. Over the years, my greatest returns to education have been my former classmates and amazing friends. You are a true gift and a strong presence in my life, which everyday makes me feel less far from ‘home’. At the same time, in the Netherlands, Nynke and Diederik remind me that I should not even look that far to feel ‘home’.

Finally, Simone and Noemi, you are at crucial stages of your educational trajectories and I hope you will soon realize their importance. This book is for you. Nonno, you were always very pleased with the idea that I was going to get the ‘highest possible degree’. I think today you would feel proud.
