Acknowledgments

As far as the content of this book is concerned, I have to start by thanking my supervisors Frans van Winden, Jean-Louis Rullière and Richard Ridderinkhof and I will follow the chronological order of our encounters to do so. Before being my supervisor and colleague, Jean-Louis was my teacher and I could already foresee then what I would experience few years later while working with him. Jean-Louis is always full of ideas and excited in starting new projects and I hope to have captured at his contact some part of his great scientific imagination. He was also there at all times to teach me how to behave in the sometimes complex French academic environment, something for which I have to thank him a lot. I met Frans and Richard a couple of minutes before my interview at the UvA after a night full of stress spent at thinking about all the tricky questions that they could ask me. I learned (and am still learning) a lot while working with Frans. The seriousness and integrity he puts into his research are as stunning as is his motivation to explore completely new fields of research. I also appreciate Frans' taste for sound debates and his humility for a researcher of his talent and reputation. I am so grateful to have been able to interact and work with him for the past years. Richard was my guide into the discovery of psychology and neuroscience and if one day you need one, I can only recommend turning to him. In any case, from the three of them I can measure the long way to go before I could become a very good researcher.

I have the chance to have been able to publish a couple of papers before my thesis completion and I owe this to all my co-authors (among which are my supervisors). I thank Johannes Fahrenfort for all the effort he put into this paper (that you can find in Chapter 3) and for the fun we had while scanning people at the AMC. I also thank Florence Naegelen and Michel Mougeot for accepting me into the carbon emission permits project and I hope to have the possibility to enjoy working with you again in the future. I also want to thank Nadège Bault for her great work on our ambitious project (that you can find in Chapter 4) and I am eager to see what will come out of it and of our following common projects.

The years of my PhD were split between two great cities, Amsterdam and Lyon. In each of them I enjoyed the work environment and I met great people. CREED is an amazing lab to visit and I could hardly imagine a better work environment with the criterions I have in mind: stimulating and smart researchers in a relaxed and funny atmosphere. Also important to notice are the facts that they have an amazing secretary (Karin Breen will never be thanked enough), that they play football twice a week and that sometimes they happen send you to NYC to present in front of top scholars. So in no particular order (and probably with a few missing names), I would like to thank Theo, Arthur, Joep, Matthijs, Marcelo (thanks for being always ready to help!), Thomas, Jona, Roel, Eva (for hosting me when I arrived for what became three months!), Jeroen, Adrian, Fabrice and Ailko. GATE, in Lyon, is also a warm place to come to. I would like to thank Marie-Claire Villeval for letting the opportunity to young researchers to present in the numerous workshops organized in Lyon, Sylvain Ferriol for the great help in programming the experiments and all the PhD crew (Julie, Cédric, Katia, Ranoua, Yann, Julie, Isabelle, M'hamed, Giancarlo, etc...).

I have now to turn to the people who allowed me to breathe some non-academic air during these years. I shall start by those who introduced me to Amsterdam life, who became truly good friends and with whom I shared a lot of great nights. Jacopo and Barbara are always there for me, cook very well and always have good plans. Markus was an amazing roommate and although I cannot see him anymore, I am very glad that he found happiness in Chile. Domenico is a true party master and is the only non-Dutch person that I know who can eat Dutch kroketten on a regular basis. Because Lyon is my hometown, I have much more persons to thank there but here is the core: Revon, Gus, Dorian, Pipo, Tini, Seb, Gaut, Boubou, Lucas and all the others.

A deep and loving thank you goes to my family who always supported my choices and I can only be grateful to be loved like I am: Frédérique, Michel, Faustine, Alexis, Antoine, Rémi, Sylvie, Pierre, Annie, Papy, Grany, Babeth, Dédé, Martine.

My last words have to go to the person who shared these years with me more than anybody else: Marion. This thesis deals with social ties and I guess we built quite a strong one during these years. We have been far away from each other for a long time but we made it. You are truly the most wonderful person I ever met and I feel so lucky to share your life. You were always there to ease my angsts and reassure me and it feels like I would not have been able to make it without you. Thank you.
