1 Introduction 1

1.1 The issue of creole genesis 1
1.2 Creole nominal expressions 2
1.3 Research questions 5
1.4 Methodology 6
  1.4.1 Sampling 6
  1.4.2 Data collection 7
1.5 Theoretical background 8
  1.5.1 Syntactic framework 8
  1.5.2 Semantic analysis: definitions 9
1.6 Organization of the book 9

I Setting the stage 11

2 Creolization and contact language formation 13

2.1 Linguistic aspects 14
  2.1.1 Superstrate languages 14
  2.1.2 Substrate languages 16
    2.1.2.1 Atlantic and Indian Ocean Creoles 16
    2.1.2.2 Afrikaans 20
    2.1.2.3 Tok Pisin 21
    2.1.2.4 Chabacano 22
    2.1.2.5 Diu Portuguese 23
2.2 Socio-historical aspects 23
  2.2.1 The amount of contact between groups of colonial population 23
    2.2.1.1 Homestead society 24
    2.2.1.2 Plantation society 26
    2.2.1.3 Maroon communities 27
    2.2.1.4 Post-colonial creole society and decreolization 28
  2.2.2 Creoles and pidgins 29
2.3 Summary and discussion 32
3 The issue of creole genesis

3.1 Creolization as a result of a break in language transmission
  3.1.1 Universalist accounts of creolization and Bickerton’s Language Bioprogram
  3.1.2 Creole Exceptionalism
  3.1.3 Substratist accounts of creolization and Lefebvre’s Relexification Hypothesis

3.2 Against the break in transmission idea
  3.2.1 Creolization as a gradual restructuing of the superstrate
  3.2.2 Mufwene’s competition-and-selection scenario of creole genesis
  3.2.3 Mentalist approach to feature competition-and-selection

3.3 Processes underlying creole development
  3.3.1 Second language acquisition
  3.3.2 Grammaticalization

3.4 Summary and Discussion

4 Nominal expressions: functions, semantics, and structure

4.1 Functions and semantics
  4.1.1 Denotation and reference
  4.1.2 Lexical noun types
  4.1.3 Borer’s universalist approach to nominal lexical semantics
  4.1.4 Individuation
  4.1.5 Quantification and other ways to express number
  4.1.6 Identifiability
  4.1.7 Definiteness
  4.1.8 Specificity and referentiality
    4.1.8.1 Semantic specificity
    4.1.8.2 Pragmatic specificity
    4.1.8.3 Specificity of definite NEs and topicality

4.2 Structure
  4.2.1 Morphosyntactic features and their structural representation
  4.2.2 NP and DP
  4.2.3 The structure of the nominal functional domain
  4.2.4 Non-overt features and the issue of null D
  4.2.5 Word order and movement
Analysis

Forms

1. Indefinite determiners
2. Definite determiners
3. Demonstratives
4. Plural markers
   - 4.1 Germanic/Romance-derived plural inflection
   - 4.2 Germanic/Romance plural demonstratives and quantifiers
   - 4.3 Germanic/Romance 3Pl pronouns
   - 4.4 Substrate-derived plural markers
   - 4.5 Substrate-derived 3Pl pronouns
   - 4.6 More on 3Pl pronoun as a plural marker
5. Summary and concluding remarks

Structures

1. Number, gender, and agreement
2. Word order
   - 2.1 Adjectives and numerals
   - 2.2 Indefinite determiners
   - 2.3 Definite determiners
   - 2.4 Plural markers
   - 2.5 Demonstratives
3. Co-occurrence and interdependencies between nominal markers
4. Summary
5. Discussion

Individuation and Number

1. Bare NEs and individuation
2. Overt markers of individuation and singularity
3. Overt markers of individuation and plurality
4. Creole plural markers as markers of collectivity
   - 4.1 Definiteness and specificity effects on the distribution of plural markers
   - 4.2 The non-redundancy principle
   - 4.3 Some special properties of creole plural markers
      - 4.3.1 Plural marking with plural, collective and mass nouns
      - 4.3.2 Plural marking with conjoined NEs
      - 4.3.3 Associative plural marking
7.4.4 Creole plural markers as collective aspect markers 185
7.5 Discussion 187
  7.5.1 A new system of number marking in creoles and its possible origins 187
  7.5.2 Distribution creole plural markers: universal principles of reference marking or substrate influence? 182
  7.5.3 Associative plural marking – a substrate-derived feature 189
  7.5.4 Superstrate-like number marking in creoles 191

8 Indefinite determiners and specificity 193
  8.1 Creole indefinite determiners as specificity markers 196
  8.2 Indefinite determiners with non-specific NEs 200
  8.3 No indefinite determiner with specific indefinite NEs 205
  8.4 Contexts that favor bare NEs 206
    8.4.1 Predicate nominals 206
    8.4.2 Complements of prepositions 209
  8.5 Discussion 210
    8.5.1 Specificity-based pattern: unfinished grammaticalization or substrate influence? 210
    8.5.2 Definiteness-based pattern: grammaticalization or superstrate influence? 212

9 Definite determiners: specificity and topicality 219
  9.1 Deviations from the definiteness-based pattern: evidence for nominal topic marking? 225
    9.1.1 Creoles without a dedicated definite determiner 225
    9.1.2 Creoles with a dedicated definite determiner 229
  9.2 Approximating the definiteness-based pattern 235
  9.3 Contexts that favor bare NEs 246
    9.3.1 NEs with unique referents 246
    9.3.2 Discourse topics 248
    9.3.3 Complements of prepositions 249
    9.3.4 Zero determiner or no determiner: a syntactic analysis 251
  9.4 Discussion 252
    9.4.1 Deviations from the definiteness-based pattern: unfinished grammaticalization or substrate influence 253
    9.4.2 The development of the definiteness-based pattern: grammaticalization or superstrate influence 256
    9.4.3 Interpreting the special cases of bare definites 259
3 Synthesis

10 Discussion and Conclusions

10.1 Major empirical observations
10.2 Implications for the issue of creole genesis
   10.2.1 Etymology and Structure
   10.2.2 Semantico-pragmatic properties and distribution
      10.2.2.1 Universal principles of reference marking and discourse organization
   10.2.2 Substrate influence?
   10.2.3 Grammaticalization or superstrate influence?
10.2.3 External factors affecting the outcome of creolization
10.2.4 Creole genesis: summary
10.3 Contribution to the research on nouns and NEs
   10.3.1 Creole data in the light of the DP-hypothesis
   10.3.2 Creole data and Rijkhoff’s lexico-semantic noun types
10.4 Directions for further research
