Over the course of writing this dissertation, I discovered many rewarding aspects of academia. Participating in research projects with colleagues from diverse international and cultural backgrounds was inspiring and enriching, and I believe this research benefited enormously from the years I spent teaching. Over the course of my education process many people influenced me, including my students, and provided me with ideas about how to understand and contribute to the world. Here, I would like to thank the most important persons that had a role in the production of this thesis. I appreciate Prof. dr. Gerd Junne and Prof. dr. Loet Leydesdorff for being part of the committee and their intellectual and appropriate commenting on the text. Dr. Caroline Nevejan’s support and feedback has always been important, first as member of the PhD club we were both a part of, and now even more as member of the defence committee. All my appreciation is extended to dr. Jim Slevin for the intellectual input and collegial generosity that he greatly contributed to the completion of the thesis and the ideas set there. I am especially thankful to Emeritus Prof. dr. Cees Hamelink for his invaluable teachings and guidance. He is a true intellectual and academic example that makes me feel proud I had the opportunity to be a part of his original and challenging academic group. Prof. dr. Peter Neijens, as a promoter of this project, offered his support and understanding throughout the development of this research, and eventually made the defence possible.

I would like to thank the University of Amsterdam for hosting me over the years at the Faculty of Social Sciences, Department of Communication Sciences and to Consejo Nacional para la Ciencia y Tecnología (CONACYT) for financial funding to complete this research. My PhD club colleagues have all contributed to the success of this work, so I extend a special thanks to Julia Hoffman, Judy Ford, Jan Anne Bos, Danielle Cliché and Samuel Tershale for their invaluable input and always constructive criticism and comments.

Many of my friends have also been close to my intellectual and personal process in Amsterdam, and I thank them for all the talks, input and joy provided. Thank you to Barak Kalir, Heidi Sohn, Antonio Carmona Báez, Jose Carlos Gómez-Aguiar, Kamenko Bulic, Ines Trigo de Sousa, Damián Zaitch, Jarret Zigon, Guy Geltner, Ignacio Polo, Miriyam Aouragh, Ruya Kocer, Juul Mulder, Juan Carlos Goilo, Linda Duits, José Luis Talancón, and Tanja Dreher.
I thank my family for accompanying me in this important personal project. My parents always gave their support, love and patience throughout my life; my brother and his family, along with my sister and her family, are an invaluable reference.

I also want to give special thanks to Zoe Goldstein, who is the nicest editor I could have hoped to work with on reviewing the dissertation. Gabriela Barrios and Olinca Marino opened doors to me and shared time and information that later became an important part of this research. Finally I would like to thank my compañera Tamara Mahoney for being so loving, patient, and smart and for helping me as no one else did to complete the difficult ending process of the thesis and to keep a bright outlook for the future.

To all my friends, which are not mentioned here but contribute to my life and happiness before, today and in the future: Thank you!
