This PhD dissertation is part of the British-Dutch research project, ‘Data Wars: New Spaces of Governing in the European War on Terror’, which is being carried out by research teams at Durham University and the University of Amsterdam and is funded by the Nederlandse organisatie voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek (NWO) and the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC). The aim of this research project is to map and analyse the reconfigured spaces of governing that are emerging through the deployment of travel and financial data for pre-emptive security action in the European fight against terrorism. My involvement in the project started in 2008 at the European Studies Department of the University of Amsterdam and, due to the promotion of my supervisor halfway through the project, ended at the Political Science Department of this same university. Throughout the project many people and institutions accompanied and assisted me in realising this PhD project.

First and foremost, I am infinitely grateful for the time, energy, and patience that my PhD supervisor, Marieke de Goede, has given me over the years. She helped me conduct my research in the best conditions possible and I learned a lot as she guided me step by step through the different (theoretical, practical, emotional) aspects of academic work. She stimulated me to participate in conferences and contribute to articles. I also have great memories of the fieldwork we carried out together in Brussels. Enthusiasm, involvement, a strong ability to provide constructive feedback, and of course great expertise in financial security questions are among the many qualities she has as a supervisor. I feel fortunate to have had the opportunity to write my dissertation under her supervision, and her work and achievements have been a continuing inspiration in many ways. I also wish to thank all of my colleagues in the Political Science Department, which provided an intellectually stimulating and active workplace. I especially appreciated collegial discussions with Chris Bickerton, Jasper Blom, Jeroen Doomerik, Jesse Hoffman, Merijn Hoitink, Paul van Hooft, Marlies Glasius, Eefje Steenvoorden, Stephanie Simon, and Floris Vermeulen.

Michael Wintle has been a constant supporter of the Data Wars project, and I am thankful for the time and effort he has put into the supervision of my dissertation. He has read each of the chapters with a great eye for detail regarding their form and content and his suggestions greatly improved the readability of this dissertation. He has also facilitated the start and end phases of my work as a PhD student in the European Studies Department and has given me precious advice on my future steps in the academic world. At the same time, I also wish to thank all my European Studies colleagues, who have provided me with a supportive and enriching intellectual community, including Huub van Baar, Luiza Bialasiewicz, Marjет Brolsma, Robin de Bruin, Sara Crombach, Thomas von der Dunk, Annemarie van Heerikhuizen, Hanna Jansen, Ben de Jong, Michael Kemper, Krisztina Lajosi, Joep Leerssen, Matthijs Lok, Martijn Lunter, László Marácz, Martin Mevius, Manet van Montfrans, Eric van Ree, Marleen Rensen, Peter Rodenburg, Jamal Shahin, Guido Snel, Menno Spiering, Anne van Wageningen, and P.W. Zuidhof.

I received a warm welcome at Durham University’s Institute for Hazard and Risk Research, where I worked as a visiting scholar from October until December 2009. Louise Amoore and Alexandra Hall were very helpful in organising this stay. Louise has been an inspiring and enthusiastic supervisor during this period, which was devoted to drafting a first version of chapter 3, on the genealogy of the European fight against terrorism financing. I admire Alex for her professional efficiency and expertise and greatly enjoyed the joint fieldwork we did in Brussels and the occasional dive we made into Durham’s swimming pool. Louise and Alex also provided me with precious comments on my draft chapters at later stages of the project.

I am greatly indebted to my interviewees, who remain anonymous in this dissertation but who spent considerable time talking to me and often helped to set up other interviews. Their willingness to provide me with often fascinating insights about daily financial security practices, their knowledge about why things are as they are, and their visions of the past and future fight against terrorism financing, were crucial for the current shape of this dissertation. These interviews were always very pleasant, and this made the gathering of new empirical information one of the most enjoyable aspects of this research project.

Over the years, I have presented draft versions of most chapters of this dissertation at various faculty and international workshops and conferences, including the University of Amsterdam (2008, 2009, 2010, 2011, 2012), the ISA Annual Convention in New York (2009), the Institute for Hazard and Risk Research at Durham University (2009), the Scottish Institute for Policing Research in Glasgow (2009), the GARNET Conference in Brussels (2010), and PRIO in Oslo (2011). I received many useful and stimulating comments and questions during the discussions that followed these presentations, including from Joyce Goggin, Anthony Amicelle, Rocco Bellanova and Gilles Favarel-Garrigues. Parts of chapter 5 have been published as “Data Wars beyond Surveillance: Opening the Black Box of SWIFT,” co-authored with Marieke de Goede and Louise Amoore, in the Journal of Cultural Economy (2012).

Discussions with friends and family have helped me to clearly formulate the questions I was investigating and allowed me to share my excitement about the findings. Their reactions – sometimes of complete astonishment or instant activism – also confirmed the societal relevance of questioning the practices of the post-9/11 fight against terrorism financing. I am thankful for their friendship and the interest that my friends and family have shown in my research topic. I have great memories of discussing terrorism financing and anti-terrorism architectural designs with Enrique Ramos on several occasions in Durham and London. I also recall the lively conversation I had about my work with my relatives in Canada on a Sunday afternoon in July 2012 on their farm. Without being exhaustive, Kirsten Verkley, Femke Besançon, Dorly Castañeda, Gaëlle Dakan, Richt Hiemstra, and Maria Kleis have been indispensable for their emotional support.
My parents, Henk and Tia Wesseling, deserve special mention for their love and support, as they have been closely following my work and well-being. During the entire project, they collected many relevant press articles. Together with my brother Jeroen, they suggested names of people who could help me get interviews with people in the initially almost impenetrable world of international banking. They were always keen to hear about my progress and the latest developments in my writing and teaching. After leaving my apartment in Amsterdam in 2011 and moving to France, they provided me with a wonderful pied-à-terre and office space in their house, which I hope to continue to make use of very regularly in the future. My gratitude to them is beyond words.

Finally, the strong support and encouragement of Jérôme Balland, now my husband, has helped me through the various stages of writing a PhD dissertation. He has always offered a listening ear and enthusiastically shared his views with me about the parallels between the practices of the War on Terror and the ideas of the mathematician Pierre Laplace. He regularly updated me on changes in French anti-money laundering and counter-terrorism financing laws and surprised me with a bibliography of SWIFT investigator Jean-Louis Bruguère on my birthday. Numerous have been the evenings when I was working late and he prepared me an airplane-style tray with a three-course meal (though much tastier than airline food) or a pot of tea with a carefully selected assortment of sweets. I am endlessly grateful for his love and devotion.
