Space in archaic Greek lyric: city, countryside and sea
Heirman, J.G.M.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis has not been the work of myself alone: many people have contributed to it and I wish to express my gratitude to them. The first person I wish to thank is my supervisor, Professor Irene de Jong, who made this thesis possible by obtaining NWO-funding for a research project on space in ancient Greek literature and selecting me as her PhD student. It was an honour for me to work with such a leading scholar, especially one who shares the goal of approaching ancient Greek literature from the perspective of modern literary theory. From the very early (and naive) draft versions to the final revisions, she has generously and rigorously helped me improve the structure and content of my work.

I would like to give special thanks to other colleagues at the University of Amsterdam: Prof. Marietje van Erp Taalman Kip for her meticulous correction of my chapters about the city and the sea; Dr. Jacqueline Klooster, Dr. Mathieu de Bakker, Niels Koopman and Paul van Uum for their most useful comments on draft versions; Prof. Albert Rijksbaron for his erudite advice on text-critical and linguistic matters; and the members of the Amsterdam ‘Hellenistenclub’, who offered many suggestions for revision in a lively evening discussion of a section of my chapter on the countryside. I am grateful to the Institute of Culture and History at the University of Amsterdam for aiding me by providing all necessary facilities to conduct my research in the best possible manner and by allowing me to partake in many interesting courses.

I must thank, even praise, Oikos, the National Research School in Classical Studies, which I found to be one of the most positive surprises in Dutch academic life. Thanks to Oikos, PhD students in Classics are able to be in contact with junior and senior researchers and partake in numerous research groups, seminars and master classes, such as a particularly memorable one in Athens. In particular, I wish thank the former director, Prof. Ineke Sluiter, as well as the current director, Prof. André Lardinois. As an expert of archaic Greek lyric, he deserves special thanks for helping me flesh out my research ideas and constructively commenting on my chapter about the sea; his cheerful presence has always stimulated my pleasure in academic life. Special thanks also to other members of Oikos who commented on sections of my thesis, namely Dr. Floris Overduin, Dr. Maarten de Pourcq, Dr. Caroline Trieschnigg and Robert Clear, as well as to the ‘Philologische Studiefonds’ for a grant.

I would also like to acknowledge researchers from abroad who helped me sharpen my thoughts and analyses. In the first place I wish to thank the staff of classics at Ghent University, where I obtained my bachelor and master degrees in Classics: especially Prof. Kristoffel Demoen for his willingness to explore the possibility of a joint PhD, and Dr. Pieter Borghart, Dr. Koen de Temmerman, Annelies Bossu and Zoë Ghyselinck for their detailed and constructive comments on several draft versions. I also owe thanks to classicists at the University of Oxford, where I was able to conduct my research in January-February 2010, in particular to Dr. Tim Whitmarsh for arranging my stay in Oxford, Dr. Dirk Obbink for allowing me to attend his classes on lyric and discussing with me his edition of the ‘new Archilochus’, and Timothy Holt and Enrico Prodi for detailed reactions to my writings about the city and the countryside. I also wish to express my gratitude for feedback about my work to Dr. Elton Barker, Dr. Fiona Hobden, Dr. Hans Bernsdorff and Fabian Meinel. Finally, I wish to thank the scholars who were so kind to send me texts which I was unable to consult: Prof. Ewen Bowie, Prof. Lucia Athanassaki, Prof. Claude Calame, Prof. Chris Carey, Prof. Anastasia Peponi, Prof. Dimitris Yatromanolakis, Dr. Anika Nicolosi and Dr. Laura Swift.

Last but not least, friends, new and old, from inside and outside academia, need to be warmly thanked. In addition to my Oikos colleagues, these include my colleagues and friends of ‘PC Hoofthuis 337’ (David, Niels, Paul, Rogier, Ron), my pub friends Simon and Cristina, the students of Greek and Latin at the University of Amsterdam, my Belgian friends (in particular Anne-Sophie, Ellen, Flor, Lien, Severine, Yannick, Zoë), my sisters Evy and Karolien, and my wonderful and amazing love Sanne (you rock my world!). My warmest gratitude for their endless support and confidence in my abilities goes out to my parents Eddy and Anne-Marie, to whom I dedicate this thesis.
