

UvA-DARE (Digital Academic Repository)

On the importance of families and public policies for child development outcomes

Rosero Moncayo, J.A.

Link to publication

Citation for published version (APA):

Rosero Moncayo, J. A. (2012). On the importance of families and public policies for child development outcomes.

General rights

It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations

If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: <http://uba.uva.nl/en/contact>, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.

Acknowledgements

Following the principle that cognitive development is a cumulative process that starts when a person is born, the path that brought me to follow a PhD program started 34 years ago. For that reason it is intuitive to start acknowledging the role of my parents, José and Jimena, not only for the optimal educational choices that they took on my behalf when I was too young and naive to make them but also for their never ending stream of love, support and understanding. They are the ones that impressed in my spirit the values of always improving myself, to be curious and to accept difficult challenges even if they painfully implied to be far for them.

As a believer on the effects that your peers have on shaping your abilities and personality, I also have to thank the influence that my “natural” peers/siblings, María Gabriela and Juan Bernardo, have had on me. I was just lucky to benefit from their company while children and I am glad that I can still learn and be inspired by them in our, now, separated journeys along life.

To follow a PhD program and write a doctoral dissertation is a complex process that comprises the participation of a large group of people. From all of them I would like to start by expressing my gratitude to my supervisor Professor Hessel Oosterbeek. I first met Hessel in Quito, my hometown, at the end of January 2008 and I was honored when months later I received his proposal to follow the PhD program at the University of Amsterdam. Since then, I have been greatly influenced by his approach to empirical research and critical thinking. Apart for the magnificent opportunity offered to me I am sincerely indebted with Hessel for all the guidance, support, encouragement and friendship that I have received from him during this period.

A special thanks is reserved to Erik Plug and Monique de Haan, my co-authors in the fifth chapter of this thesis. During these four years, my learning experience has benefited greatly from the discussions with them. Even in my darkest hours I could always count on finding their doors opened for some advice, feedback or idea that could put me back on track.

The working life of a PhD student can not be complete without the interaction with your academic peers constantly challenging your ideas and research perspectives. I am thankful to Noemi, Nadine, Nienke, Adam, Nina, Steven, Jona, Diana and Thomas for their always enriching insights, discussions and company. All the chapters of this thesis have in one way or another their mark.

I would like to express my gratitude to all the people in Ecuador that helped me to fund and collect the data from which this thesis has benefited. I am grateful to Marcelo Perez of the Interamerican Development Bank for helping me with the crusade of findings funds. I would also like to acknowledge the help of Rosario, Andrea, Carla, Sebastian, Mayra, Eduardo and all the wonderful people at SIISE and Habitus for helping me to supervise the data collection. A special mention to Juan Ponce without whose support the very idea of pursuing a PhD had been cut short.

Apart from being a learning experience that builds up your skills as a researcher, to do a PhD is an endeavor of continuous self finding that push you beyond any previously conceived definition of what your natural limits were. Additionally, it is an enterprise that test your abilities of adaptation, your self-commitment and your patience. I gratefully acknowledge the help of my friends here in the Netherlands that made that process smoother through talks, laughs, beers, dinners, breakfasts, lunches, barbecues, trips and other events. A special thanks to Rene and Jaldert my paranymphs, but also to Tessa, Ana, Rafaela, Esther, Noemi, Paul and Esteban for making the hard task of living away from home an enjoyable experience.

Nevertheless, no gratitude is greater than the one that is reserved for my wife Carolina. I could try to write entire books trying to express my admiration and devotion for all the support and encouragement that you have given me through this time, but I am afraid that I would never be able to do you justice. It does not matter how much I try to analyze the situation, your unconditional love is the sole explanation of your decision to leave your work, home and life to follow this crazy person to the other end of the world. If that is not altruistic behavior, what is it? The reality is that it does not matter how many theses one person writes or how many papers one person manages to publish, it is love a man's biggest finding, and you are my biggest finding. I can just humbly admire your strength and determination and be grateful for all the happiness and feeling of completeness that you selflessly bring every day to my life.

José Alejandro Rosero Moncayo

Amsterdam, June 2012