Preface and Acknowledgments

At the present moment, perhaps more than ever, images are pervasively present in social life. We perceive but also have the capacity to produce and see more and more images. We are confronted with such questions as: how do we believe in images, how do they acquire their importance as public objects and how is their status produced? These are related to further questions around the power of images and concern not only their iconic or symbolic powers, but also the power mechanisms around images, related to their display and presentation.

Many artists demonstrate a distinct interest in revisiting the role of religion and the legacy of religious art as part of their reflection on these questions. This indicates a desire for situating one’s practice with regard to the past and placing it in a dialogue with a very different economy of the image. By re-appropriating and reworking religious images artists not only re-examine the complex relationship between religion and art, but also their respective regimes of visibility.

This book is about a particular fold that is happening in the space of contemporary art, which opens up a space to think about religion through images. After I began this research project, many exhibitions that dealt with the relationship between religion and art were organised, demonstrating a multiplicity of approaches, debates and lecture series, which I followed and included in my research. Some parts of this thesis have also appeared as articles in several volumes and journals.

I am profoundly grateful to Bram Kempers, who agreed to adopt and supervise a project already in progress. Without his encouragement, unconditional support, patience in reading versions of my chapters, and precise comments, this thesis would not have been possible. My sincere thanks go to Laurens ten Kate, Aukje van Rooden and Ignaas Devisch with whom I co-edited the volume Re-treating Religion: Deconstructing Christianity with Jean-Luc Nancy, 2012. The work we did together on the volume and the discussions we had provided a stimulating and inspiring context. Special thanks go to Vladimir Stissi, a friend and colleague with whom I initiated the exhibition Capturing Metamorphosis, 2010, on the occasion of which I had the privilege to experiment with ideas, and to work with an inspiring group of artists in the context of the Allard Pierson Museum in Amsterdam. Vladimir provided support in the moments I needed it most, and read and gave invaluable feedback on chapters. Special thanks are also due to Sylvia Mieszkowski, a friend and colleague, whose feedback and encouragement helped me a lot. I would also like to extend my gratitude to Hent de Vries who gave feedback on my research and was interested to discuss ideas, and to Ruth Leys and Michael Fried for one of my most intellectually inspiring moments – the semester at the Humanities Center at The Johns Hopkins University. My sincere thanks go to Helen Tartar, the editor of Fordham Press; besides being a precise and professional editor, her generosity and support gave me confidence in the development of my writing. I am indebted to my students at the Dutch Art Institute, Arnhem, and the Rietveld Academy, Amsterdam. Both programs provided a welcoming, inspiring and intellectually stimulating context in which to teach, where I could discuss and test ideas, and proved to be the places where much valuable and innovative research happens. I am grateful to Gabrielle Schleijpen and to Suska Mackert who created a very productive and stimulating environment in which to work. I would like to thank Mieke Bal who supervised my research in its initial phase as part of the team-project Critical Incarnations, and the NWO program The Future of the Religious Past for funding my research. I am grateful to many friends and colleagues who have read and commented on different parts, texts and chapters of this study: Maria Jose de Abreu, Thomas Lange, Rachel Esner, Eva Fotiadi, Gülru Çakmak, Bastiaan Hoorneman, Martine van Kampen, Boyan Manchev, Kate Khatib and Charlotte Roijackers. Special thanks go to Clare Donald who proof-read the final manuscript with patience and precision. I am very grateful and lucky to have the ever loving, cheerful and supportive presence of Dirk Bruinsma who has been there all along.
