

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

For a literature student, who was happily ensconced in the English department, to take on a multi-media and interdisciplinary PhD project required great enthusiasm and intellectual agility. While I had an abundance of the former, I undoubtedly struggled with the latter. I am, therefore, especially grateful for three supervisors Deborah Cherry, Jaap Kooijman, and Marieke de Goede, whose ability to crisscross disciplinary boundaries with ease is both enviable and inspiring. I will sorely miss seeing and reading their comments on the margins of my texts; their insightful remarks on earlier drafts led me out of my muddled thoughts in the first few years and challenged me to sharpen my arguments in the end phase. They have been mentors of the best kind: generous, knowledgeable, patient, and relentlessly encouraging.

I would like to thank Sudeep Dasgupta for allowing me to sit in on a few of his Master's-level courses, especially his tutorial on Jacques Rancière, which equipped me well for further intellectual explorations on “the sensible.”

I also greatly appreciate Christoph Lindner and Eloë Kingma of the Amsterdam School for Cultural Analysis for their kind encouragement and career advice. The school also provided generous financial assistance to offset the cost of copyright permission for the various photographs that appeared in chapter five.

Many thanks to my colleagues in the Media Studies department for their friendship and cheerleading: Nisa Fachry, Laura Copier, Alexandra Schneider, and Catherine Lord.

I remember fondly the intellectual generosity of Mireille Rosello, Joost de Bloois, and all who participated in The 9/11 Effect research group throughout the years.

My gratitude to my husband Menno for his enduring love and support; my three daughters Makenna, Byren, and Imogen for their daily hugs and kisses; my mom Linda and my dad Charles, who passed away during the final year of this project and did not see its completion; my brother Tony and my sister Emily; and finally, my in-laws Bob and Suze.

I have been richly blessed with two friends, Lillian Stauber and Tonia Davidson, who have faithfully prayed for me and encouraged me through most of my adult life, amid the extraordinary and the mundane. If I often began our Skype conversations by recounting my PhD woes, their sense of humor and wisdom were sure to have me roaring with laughter and brimming with hope by the end.

Navigating through the intellectual complexities, emotional anxieties, and time demands of a PhD would surely have been a joyless task without the care and assistance of this lovely group of mentors, colleagues, family, and friends.
