

UvA-DARE (Digital Academic Repository)

Introduction: Family migration as an integration issue? Policy perspectives and academic insights

Bonjour, S.; Kraler, A.

DOI

10.1177/0192513X14557490

Publication date

2015

Document Version

Final published version

Published in

Journal of Family Issues

Link to publication

Citation for published version (APA):

Bonjour, S., & Kraler, A. (2015). Introduction: Family migration as an integration issue? Policy perspectives and academic insights. Journal of Family Issues, 36(11), 1407-1432. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192513X14557490>

General rights

It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations

If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: <https://uba.uva.nl/en/contact>, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.

UvA-DARE is a service provided by the library of the University of Amsterdam (<https://dare.uva.nl>)

Introduction: Family Migration as an Integration Issue? Policy Perspectives and Academic Insights

Journal of Family Issues

2015, Vol. 36(11) 1407–1432

© The Author(s) 2014

Reprints and permissions:

sagepub.com/journalsPermissions.nav

DOI: 10.1177/0192513X14557490

jfi.sagepub.com

Saskia Bonjour¹ and Albert Kraler²

Abstract

“Family migration” and “integration” are intimately related concepts in policy discourses in Europe today. Assumptions about the relation between “family migration” and “integration” play a crucial role in shaping policies. This special issue aims to examine the axis between “family migration,” “policy,” and “integration,” both from a policy perspective, and from the perspective of individuals engaged in family migration. In this introduction, we first discuss scholarly work on family migration policies in Europe, which analyzes how policies and discourses on family migration and integration participate in the politics of belonging. Second, we explore the fragmented and incomplete insights offered by existing research about the actual relation between family migration and migrant integration.

Keywords

family migration, migrant integration, gender, identity, migration policy

¹Department of Political Science, University of Amsterdam, Amsterdam, the Netherlands

²International Centre for Migration Policy Development, Vienna, Austria

Corresponding Author:

Saskia Bonjour, Department of Political Science, University of Amsterdam, Postbus 15578, 1001 NB Amsterdam, the Netherlands.

Email: s.a.bonjour@uva.nl

Introduction

“Family migration” and “integration” are intimately related concepts in policy discourses in Europe today. Assumptions about the relation between “family migration” and “integration” play a crucial role in shaping policies. These assumptions pertain both to the effect of family migration on migrants’ integration in European societies and, conversely, to the effect of migrants’ integration on family migration flows. Such policy perspectives on the relation between “integration” and “family migration” are very much part of the broader debate on social cohesion, national identity, and migration, which has been so high on European political agendas over the past decade.

Not so long ago, family migration remained a blind spot in migration studies. As long as migrants were analyzed almost exclusively as individuals driven by strictly economic motives, the role of the family in patterns of migration, settlement, and integration was neglected (Bailey & Boyle, 2004; Kofman, 2004). However, the past decade has witnessed the emergence of a rich body of research which investigates different aspects of the family dimension of international migration, including migrants’ incorporation into receiving societies. More recently, this literature has been complemented with studies of the politics and policies of family migration, reflecting the increased salience of family related migration in public debates on migration.

This special issue aims to contribute to this emerging field by examining the axis between “family migration,” “policy,” and “integration.” The contributions in the first part of this special issue adopt a policy perspective, to explore how the role of the family in migrant integration has been conceptualized in political and public debates, and how family migration policies have been shaped by concerns and perceptions related to integration. The contributions in the second part adopt the perspective of the individuals engaged in family migration. These articles investigate how migrant and binational families deal with state regulations and the other challenges they encounter when building a new family life for themselves, and how family migration policies affect individual dimensions of integration and membership.

This introduction provides an inevitably incomplete overview of the literature with a similar twofold focus. First, we discuss scholarly work on family migration policies in Europe, which analyzes how policies and discourses on family migration and integration construe identities and communities, that is, participate in the politics of belonging. Second, we explore what we know from existing research about the actual relation between family migration and migrant integration. This knowledge is fragmented and incomplete. Third and finally, we present the contributions to this edited volume.

Policy Perspectives on Family Migration and Integration: The Politics of Belonging

Family migration policies have come under academic scrutiny only recently. Except for Bhabha and Shutter (1994), pioneers in the field, most studies date from the second half of the last decade. Extensive research has been done in the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Germany, and the Nordic countries, while relatively little is known about the dynamics of family migration policies in other parts of Europe (but see Bekker, Crosgrave, & Labor, 2013 on Ireland; Fonseca, 2008; Kraler, 2010b; and Kraler, Hollomey, Hurich, König, & Muzak, 2013 on Austria; Maskens, 2013a on Belgium, France, Italy, and Switzerland; Oliveira, Cancela, & Fonseca, 2013 on Portugal; and Raissiguier, 2013 on France). The literature demonstrates that family migration policies are highly contested and form part of broader debates on identity, social cohesion, welfare, and diversity.

Family migration has long been closely associated with integration—even before integration became the dominant frame to describe the processes of settlement and incorporation of migrants into receiving countries in the 1990s and 2000s. In many European countries, the foreign wives of male citizens automatically acquired the citizenship of their husbands on marriage until the 1960s, and even retained unconditional access to their husbands' nationality on simple declaration of their wish to naturalize into the 1980s (de Hart & van Oers, 2006; Kraler, 2010b). Marriage to a male citizen thus was seen as tantamount to (legal) integration. In regard to labor migration, more practical concerns prevailed: in the first half of the 20th century, the French government preferred Italian labor migrants who were married and brought their family, because it feared the “violent and unpredictable behavior” of unmarried men (Lucassen, 2005, p. 106-107). In the 1960s and 1970s, the International Labour Organization (ILO) recommended granting migrants the right to family reunification because it would promote their well-being and integration in receiving societies (see, e.g., ILO, 1974 quoted in ILO, 1999). A similar perspective has shaped the European Union (EU) policies on free movement rights, developed since the 1960s for workers and transformed into a fundamental entitlement of EU citizens in recent years. The European Commission considers family migration a “vehicle to integration” and pleads for a liberal interpretation of EU law on family reunification for non-EU citizens, supported by the EU Court of Justice (Block & Bonjour, 2013; Strik, de Hart, & Nissen, 2013, p. 48). While EU member states have nominally endorsed this view in the preamble to the Family Reunification Directive (Directive 2003/86/EC, preamble, para 5), today the Portuguese government is one of the few European governments which actually share this perspective and therefore encourage migrants to bring their families (Strik et al., 2013, p. 108).

Since the turn of the century the very large majority of governments in Europe have come to adopt the opposite perspective: family migration is associated with “failing” integration in the context of soaring anxieties about identity, community, and social cohesion (Kofman, Kraler, Kohli, & Schmolle, 2011). In public and political debates, the ethnic and cultural diversity produced by past and present migration flows in general and family related flows in particular has been presented as a threat to social cohesion and national identity. The alleged “failure” of migrants to integrate is “often laid at the door of their families, or rather their practices of familial relations, and the (collectivist) principles (cultural, religious) which underpin them” (Grillo, 2008, p. 31).

Indeed, to a large degree the “problem” of family migration and integration is construed as a problem of culture, identity, and belonging. National identities in Europe today are construed in opposition to the perceived culture and identity of migrants, epitomized by the “migrant”—especially “Muslim”—family. Whereas the “Western” family is imagined as modern, emancipated, and egalitarian, the “migrant” family is associated with tradition, patriarchy, oppression, and even violence (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Raissiguier, 2013; Rytter, 2013, p. 204; Van Walsum, 2008). This “unintegrable” family (Grillo, 2008, p. 24), where “deviant” practices such as polygamy and female circumcision are produced and reproduced, is seen to pose a threat not only to the autonomy of individual migrants but also to “social order” (Gedalof, 2007) and to the “national self” (Schmidt, 2011, p. 271).

Yet family related migration has also been problematized in terms of the “quality” of migrants coming in as family migrants. Often strongly interlinked with, but analytically distinct from cultural arguments, family migrants have been argued to be less educated, less skilled, and poorly integrated in the labor market, with women in particular showing far below average rates of labor force participation (Kofman, Saharso, & Vacchelli, 2013). It is these combined socioeconomic and cultural concerns that have strongly shaped policy changes aiming at making admission more selective (Strik et al., 2013).

Probably the most problematized form of family migration is the transnational marriage of persons of migrant origin to spouses from their own or their (grand) parents’ country of origin. Such marriage patterns contradict the assumption, based on classic theories of assimilation, that “second” and “third generation” migrants will marry outside of their ethnic community. To policymakers, such transnational marriages conjure up the frightening scenario of a potentially endless chain migration coupled to the transfer from generation to generation of socioeconomic deprivation as well as traditional practices and norms (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Kofman et al., 2011). The choice for a partner from abroad in itself is interpreted as a sign of insufficient integration or belonging (Muller Myrdahl, 2010), based on “traditional” practices such as forced or arranged marriages (Schmidt, 2011). Whereas in the United Kingdom and Norway, arranged marriages are recognized as a legitimate—if not necessarily unproblematic—family form (Eggebø, 2010; Muller Myrdahl, 2010; Wray, 2009), in countries such as the Netherlands and Denmark, arranged marriages are conflated with forced marriages, and any form of marriage which is not perceived as based on romantic love between two autonomous individuals is rejected as incompatible with national values (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Fair, 2010).

The “othering” of the “migrant” family is highly gendered. Migrant women are consistently represented as victims of economic deprivation and social isolation as well as of patriarchal oppression and violence (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Gedalof, 2007). The often implicit counterimage of this victimization of migrant women is the representation of migrant men as violent oppressors: “as migrant women are denied agency, migrant men are denied humanity and vulnerability” (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013, p. 73; see also Wray, 2011). Whereas in the past, policy makers’ concerns focused on foreign grooms, who were considered labor migrants in disguise (Bhabha & Shutter, 1994; Wray, 2011), today the most problematized marriage migrant is the foreign bride, perceived as an unemancipated victim bound to make a bad mother (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013).

Family migration policies reflect these identity constructions: construing migrant families as “product and producer” of “deviant norms and practices”—that is, of failing integration—places them “outside the imagined national community,” which legitimizes keeping these families out through restrictive migration policies (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013, p. 73; see also Olwig, 2011, pp. 191–192). Family migration policies are shaped in fundamental ways by dominant norms about what the roles of men and women ought to be, what marriage ought to be, what parenting ought to be, and what family ought to be (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Strasser, Kraler, Bonjour, & Bilger, 2009; Van Walsum, 2008; Wray, 2011). Thus, in most European countries the dominance of the nuclear family model results in very restricted admission for family members other than the spouse and minor children. Also common is the obligation on the sponsoring spouse to earn a minimum income, placing the migrant spouse in a position of dependency that is reminiscent of the traditional breadwinner model (Strasser et al., 2009). In the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Germany, Denmark, France, and Norway, the need to “protect women” from forced marriages has been invoked to justify recent restrictive reforms of income requirements, integration requirements, and age requirements (Block, 2012; Bonjour & Block, 2014; Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; Collet, Philippe, & Santelli, 2008; Eggebø, 2010; Fair, 2010; Muller Myrdahl, 2010; Wray, 2009).

Controls aimed at identifying “fraudulent” or “sham” marriages are shaped by similar “moral gatekeeping” (Wray, 2006) based on dominant norms about marriage and gender roles. Those couples who deviate from the norm that marriage should be based on love between two equal and autonomous individuals are met with suspicion (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013; de Hart, 2003; Eggebø, 2013; Lavanchy, 2013; Maskens, 2013b; Messinger, 2011). However, in the United Kingdom, Norway, and Finland officials have also been observed to evaluate the “authenticity” of marriage according to not only “European” norms but also their conception of the “typical traditional” marriage of the migrant community, and to exclude couples deemed “atypical” (Eggebø, 2013; Pellander, 2015; Wray, 2011). Large age differences are likely to trigger extra controls, as are couples where the male spouse migrates to join his wife, rather than the other way around (de Hart, 2003; Wray, 2011).

In family migration policies, such gendered family norms interact with conceptions of ethnicity and class to construct the category of the undesirable family migrant, likely to disrupt the national community and to be a burden on the welfare state (Eggebø, 2010; Fair, 2010; Messinger, 2012; Wray, 2006, 2011). Thus, family migration policies are control policies that aim to protect the labor market and the welfare state, but also to “defend the (imagined) homogeneity and . . . cultural cohesion” of the nation (Schmidt, 2011, p. 260). In this sense, family migration policies are symbolic policies, which serve to “define and mark the [national] norm and identity, and to show that the government upholds and protects this norm and identity” (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013, p. 73).

Family migration policies are different from other migration policies, in that they concern not only “outsiders knocking at a state’s doors and requesting entry” but also the “moral claim of insiders,” people living within state borders who ask to be united with their family (Block, 2012, p. 37; see also Bonjour, 2009, p. 17). Indeed, the right to family reunification is construed as the right of legal insiders—the right of sponsors with some form of legal tie to the country of residence to bring in family members (de Hart, 2009). Laws and regulations attribute different degrees of entitlement to family migration to different categories of people, thus constructing a “stratification” (Kraler, 2010a) or “hierarchy” (Wray, 2011) within the state’s population (Strik et al., 2013). The more the person requesting family reunification is considered an insider, a “member” who belongs to the nation, the stronger his or her claim to be entitled to live his or her family life on national territory (Staver, 2015; Block, 2015). Accordingly, many states grant privileged family migration rights to citizens, and no family migration rights at all to seasonal workers. Moreover, states “evaluate the ‘quality’ of membership” both in socioeconomic and in cultural terms by imposing income and integration requirements (Block, 2012). The Danish “attachment requirement,” which tests whether the couples’ ties to Denmark are stronger than to any other country, is a powerful example of a policy instrument aimed at assessing whether the person wanting to bring in foreign family members really “belongs.” According to Schmidt (2011), its purpose is to make a distinction between Danish citizens: on the one hand citizens who belong, and on the other hand citizens with a migrant background, whose integration and membership is questioned and who are therefore denied family migration rights. Here as in other areas of migrant and migration policies, “integration” becomes a term less related to emancipation and improvement than to evaluating to which extent migrants and their descendants are “proper members of a given society” (Olwig, 2011, p. 187). To “marry wrongly,” that is, to choose a foreign partner, is interpreted as a sign of “failed integration” and questionable belonging and membership—which in turn weakens the claim to family migration rights. This is true for citizens of migrant origin (Muller Myrdahl, 2010; Wray, 2011) but also for white women (de Hart, 2006; Wray, 2011, p. 231) and even sometimes for white men, especially those seen to look for “docile” and “sexually servile” women abroad (Bonjour & de Hart, 2013, p. 66).

Ironically, whereas “integration” has become a criterion to deny family migration to certain sponsors and foreign family members, integration and the presence of family ties have—largely as a result of jurisprudence on Article 8 (protection of private and family life) of the European Convention of Human Rights—become increasingly important rationales for regularizing migrants with little or no claim to residence, thus providing a humanitarian backdoor for some of those excluded by recent restrictions of family migration policies (Chauvin, Garcés-Mascareñas, & Kraler, 2013; Kraler, 2011). Humanitarian reasons for allowing what could be called “family retention” (Strik et al., 2013, p. 2) have sometimes translated into specific regularization programs addressing families, such as a 2006 program in France targeting parents of children enrolled in schools below the age of 13 (Kraler, Reichel, König, Baldwin-Edwards, & Şimşek, 2014). But exceptional mechanisms allowing migrants to regularize their stay based on family ties and integration have also found their way into regular migration policy frameworks such as in Austria, Belgium, or Spain (Chauvin et al., 2013; Kraler et al., 2014). The extent to which such humanitarian provisions provide an avenue for obtaining legal residence, however, differs widely.

Academic Perspectives on Family Migration and Integration: Fragmented Insights

As argued above, the connection between integration and family migration in political discourse and policy is largely a matter of symbolic identity politics. This representation of migrant families as product and producer of “deviant” family practices and therefore of “failed integration” is based on beliefs rather than facts. Even the alleged inferior socioeconomic characteristics of family migrants, which in principle seem easier to verify or falsify, are barely sustained by solid scholarly knowledge. All in all, the “broader research evidence” on the relation between family migration and integration is “remarkably limited” (Charsley, 2012).

There is however a substantial and expanding body of research which focuses on the politically most problematized form of family migration, the marriage of people of migrant origin to partners from their own or their (grand)parents’ country of origin. In policy circles, such transnational marriage patterns are considered a result of “failed” integration of these “second” or “third generation” migrants, that is, of the prevalence of “traditional” marriage norms and practices and a negative attitude toward the host society. This perception has been partially confirmed by studies of transnational marriages among Turkish and Moroccan origin youth in Belgium and the Netherlands, and Pakistani origin youth in the United Kingdom (Hooghiemstra, 2003; Lievens, 1999; Shaw & Charsley, 2006; Timmerman, 2006). These studies have shown that young men—and their parents—often prefer a wife from the “home country” because she is expected to be the “bearer of uncorrupted tradition desirable both in a chaste wife and in mothers” (Charsley, 2012), unlike the women grown up in Europe. Based on a survey of children of Turkish and Moroccan immigrants in six European countries, Carol, Ersanilli, and Wagner (2014) confirm the association of more “traditional” attitudes to transnational marriage preferences by showing that transnational marriages are associated with a higher degree of religiosity whereas the reverse is true for less religious children of immigrants (Carol et al., 2014, pp. 19-20). However, while Carol et al. observe no gender differences, previous French, Dutch, and Belgian studies found that women from Turkish and Moroccan migrant communities opt for transnational marriage not out of loyalty to “tradition,” but because they expect foreign men to be more modern and progressive and because the distance from their family-in-law and the migrant status of their new husband will assure them a position of relative power and independence in their marriage (Autant, 1995; Hooghiemstra, 2003; Lievens, 1999; Timmerman, 2006).

According to Lievens (1999) and Carol et al. (2014), the choice of a transnational marriage is related to high educational achievements—which Lievens associates with “being highly assimilated”—for women, and low educational achievements for men. However, a German study finds this relation for men but not for women (González Ferrer, 2006) and another German study neither for men nor for women (Kalter & Schroedter, 2010). The contradictory results of these studies suggest that other factors such as generation or cohort effects may significantly influence marriage preferences. In Belgium, persons who marry a foreign spouse often have a weak socioeconomic position: 20% are unemployed (twice as high as the general unemployment rate) and 66% earn a gross monthly income of less than €1,500 (Timmerman & Wets, 2011).

Research confirms the perception among policymakers that the choice for a transnational marriage among migrant youth involves not only the couple but also the parents, but “forced” marriage seems a great deal less common than often assumed. Instead, researchers observe negotiations between parents and children based on loyalty and attachment (Shaw & Charsley, 2006; Straßburger, 2003). Parental involvement does not exclude freedom of partner choice (Hooghiemstra, 2003). Recent research shows that the role of parents in the partner choice of Turkish Belgians is declining, which may partly explain the decline of transnational marriage among this group in the last decade. Other explanations could be the “awareness of the problems and risks involved in transnational marriages” and the occurrence of premarital relationships observed among young Turkish Belgians (Van Kerckem, Bracht, Putte, & Stevens, 2013).

Some researchers argue explicitly that transnational marriage among youth of migrant origin should not be interpreted as a sign of failed integration, but rather as a result of demographic structures and social networks (Straßburger, 2003), a “conscious negotiation process” in response to “challenges in the local marriage market” (Van Kerckem et al., 2013). Marriage migrants are “border artistes” (Beck-Gernsheim, 2011) who hope for a better life—both in economic and in social and political terms—in Europe (Timmerman & Wets, 2011). Scholars studying transnational marriages in and from Asia have also challenged the perception of female family migrants as passive and oppressed “import brides,” emphasizing instead the agency of women, who opt for transnational marriage deliberately (Constable, 2005; Piper & Roces, 2003).

Policy discourses on family migration and integration do not acknowledge the diversity of transnational marriage patterns observed among different migrant groups. In Denmark, while youth of Turkish origin bring in marriage migrants with a low educational background, Pakistani Danes marry highly educated foreign spouses (Çelikaksoy, Sykt Nielsen, & Verner, 2006). In the United Kingdom, Pakistani and Bangladeshi are far more likely to marry someone from “back home” than Indians (Dale, 2008). In Germany, transnational marriage is of notable importance among Turks and ex-Yugoslavs, but negligible among Italians, Spaniards, and Greeks—possibly in part due to strict immigration rules which leave family migration as virtually the only accessible migration channel. These rules apply to Turks and ex-Yugoslavs but not to EU citizens (Kalter & Schroedter, 2013). In the Netherlands, family formation patterns have been observed to vary according to the “prevailing cultural values and behavioral patterns” of migrants’ region of origin, which result in substantially different patterns of family formation among migrants from Islamic countries, from countries with a Confucian tradition, and from the Caribbean (De Valk, Liefbroer, Esveldt, & Henkens, 2004). Research also shows that not only men of migrant origin but also “white” men may seek a partner from abroad because they assume that women from Asia or Eastern Europe are less emancipated and more docile and homely (Charsley, 2012; Constable, 2005).

While the dynamics of marriage migration are relatively well-researched, much less is known about the role of the family in other migration dynamics, especially in Europe. For a long time, migration was considered an individual decision based on a rational cost-benefit analysis. Only recently, as the role of networks and transnational ties has come into focus in migration studies, have scholars begun to inquire how the migration decision is “related to the family life cycle” (Kofman, 2004, pp. 248-249) and “influenced by intra-household power relations” (Bailey & Boyle, 2004, p. 231). Among the few European studies of families’ migration decisions is the book by Ackers and Stalford (2004), which shows the crucial importance of parents’ perceptions of their children’s best interest in shaping migration decisions, as well as the limited say which children themselves have in matters of mobility.

It is common for policy makers in Europe to assume that family migrants face integration problems after arrival, because they have not been selected for their education or professional skills, and are perceived to marry into closed and isolated communities (Bonjour, 2010). Scholars have suggested that family migrants are likely to be low skilled as a result of the “combination of the characteristics of the original immigrant population in these countries and later network effects,” since the low-skilled workers originally recruited in many European countries are likely to bring in equally low-skilled persons through chain migration (Nannestad, 2007, p. 518). Preliminary results of ongoing research by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) into characteristics of family migrants generally suggest that joining spouses indeed mirror sponsors in their human capital characteristics, thus multiplying the education composition of other types of migration. Not unsurprisingly, the category family reunification in OECD countries comprises the relatively largest share of low-skilled migrants, above all reflecting past large-scale recruitment of low-skilled migrants. In regard to family formation, the OECD finds that family formation by immigrants brings higher skills than family formation by natives (Chaloff, 2013).

There is very little empirical research, however, which maps how migrants who were admitted on family grounds fare after arrival, in comparison with other migrant categories. One rare example is Jayaweera (2012) who finds that in the United Kingdom, family migrants show lower rates of employment and lower language skills than students and labor migrants, but higher rates of perceived financial security and much higher participation in elections. In Australia, where better data appears to be available for comparing migrant categories (Charsley, 2012), Chiswick, Liang Lee, and Miller (2006) find that shortly after immigration, family migrants' language skills are lower than those of economic migrants, but higher than those of refugees. After 3 to 5 years, the differences in speaking skills between these categories disappear, and differences in reading and writing skills diminish substantially. Research in Denmark has shown that female marriage migrants may have trouble improving their language skills, because they have limited access to social and professional environments where Danish is spoken, but also because migration law obliges them to work rather than attend language courses, in order to secure their residence permit (Liversage, 2009).

Studies of internal migration in the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Netherlands have shown that for women who move as family migrants—as a majority among female migrants do—migration is likely to have a negative impact on their employment situation, because it is not their own professional or economic situation but that of their spouse or of the family as a whole which determines the decision to move (Boyle, Cooke, Halfacree & Smith, 2001; Smits 1999). Scholars studying transnational marriages in and from Asia have likewise pointed out that female marriage migrants do not necessarily experience emancipation or upward social or professional mobility as a result of migration (Constable, 2005; Palriwala & Uberoi, 2008). They nevertheless emphasize that female migrants should not be victimized or denied agency. Women may follow at some phases of their lives, and lead in others (Piper & Roces, 2003). Moreover, the distinctions between the categories of “wife” and “worker” are “very much blurred” (Piper & Roces, 2003, p. 4), since “‘wives’ are typically also ‘workers,’ though their ‘work’ may not be adequately recognized as such” (Palriwala & Uberoi, 2008, p. 26).

Policy makers in Europe worry about the effects of intraethnic transnational marriage on the integration prospects of the children born from such unions. Research among children of Turkish origin in southwest Germany partly justifies these concerns. It shows that children of intermarriages have better cognitive and language skills than other groups of Turkish children, while children with a first-generation mother and a second-generation father score worse than all others. This latter finding might be interpreted as revealing that second-generation male migrants who choose a partner from their “home country” as well as their foreign wives are “negatively selected along various dimensions.” While the cognitive skills of the children are entirely explained by the parents’ education and socioeconomic status, children’s language skills are affected in crucial ways by the parents’ political, cultural, and social integration in Germany, including their German language skills and language use (Becker, 2011).

Policy makers in Europe also tend to assume that family migration has a negative impact on the sponsor, that is, on the resident who asks to be united with foreign family members. However, the little research available contradicts this assumption. In the United Kingdom, the engagement of Pakistani, Bangladeshi, and Indian women in paid work depends mostly on their qualifications, parenthood, and ethnic origin—but not at all on whether or not their husband is a migrant from the “home country” (Dale, 2008). Research among refugees in Scandinavian countries shows that the presence of family is important to the integration process, not only in terms of social and emotional well-being, but also because it stimulates labor market participation. Engaging in paid work allows refugees “to assert themselves as persons of respect in their family and thereby to regain their social identity as responsible family members” (Olwig, 2011, p. 193). In addition, research on labor market trajectories of skilled migrants after admission in Canada has shown the importance of social and emotional capital within the family household for the success of labor market and reskilling strategies of (usually male) members of the household active on the labor market. Thus women’s broader community based social networks, linked to children’s schooling or paid and volunteer community work has been found essential for job searches and for sustaining a sense of belonging in often difficult contexts of reskilling of male skilled migrants, who found Canada’s labor market much more difficult to navigate than promised (Creese, Dyck, & McLaren, 2011). Thus even if labor market outcomes in particular of female family migrants appears to be less favorable than that of other migrants, it is important to recognize their role in contributing to successful economic integration of the household.

A major aspect of family migrants’ life after arrival, which is usually overlooked by policymakers, are the relations within the couple and in the wider family. These relations are affected in crucial ways by the migration process. Within the couple, “opposed expectations” may be a source of disappointment and frustration, if the migrant spouse came to Europe to lead a “modern” life, while the sponsor went “back home” to seek a “traditional” partner (Timmerman, 2006). Moreover, marriage migration raises issues of power, which may cause tensions within the couple, as the migrant spouse usually has far fewer judicial, social, and professional resources than the sponsoring spouse (de Hart, 2003; Liversage, 2012). If the sponsor is male, and the migrant spouse is female, traditional gender roles and dependencies are reinforced. Some migrant women find it “self-evident” to care for the children and the household, and feel “protected in an alien society by their traditional role” (Timmerman, 2006, p. 135). However, migrant women who are used to, or aspire to, more egalitarian gender roles often feel intensely frustrated and belittled (Strasser et al., 2009; Timmerman, 2006). Male sponsoring spouses may also resent being pushed into the “breadwinner” role, when they are used to sharing work and care with their partner (Strasser et al., 2009).

If the sponsor is female, and the migrant spouse is male, then traditional gender roles and dependencies are reversed. The resulting power (re)negotiation may be difficult and painful (Liversage, 2012). Especially in the first period after migration, the woman often provides for the family. Many migrant men suffer from being unable to perform their traditional role as “breadwinner” (Strasser et al., 2009; Timmerman, 2006). The reversal of power balance and gender roles may be particularly pronounced if the couple moves in with the wife’s family—whereas tradition in, for instance, Pakistan proscribes that the new wife moves in with her husband’s family. The frustration experienced by migrant men, who have not been prepared in their upbringing for having to adapt to another household, may “help to explain instances where such marriages have ended in the husband’s violence, desertion, or taking a second wife” (Charsley, 2005, p. 85).

Migration also affects relations with the wider family. Very often, migration implies a “shrinking family” as the circle of family members living nearby is sharply reduced. Women especially address how this affects their lives. Some find it liberating to get away from the pressures and constraints of their (conservative) family environments. Others suffer from the absence of family, which implies not only loss of social contacts, but also loss of practical support without which they struggle to reconcile professional life with family duties (Strasser et al., 2009). However, a Danish study found that migration may also lead to intensified ties with extended family: almost half of Turkish transnational couples in Denmark who started their married lives in the 1990s did so living with the parents of one of the partners, for practical and economic as well as normative reasons. Some women felt locked up by their parents-in-law in “traditional Turkish norms of female domesticity.” Other women appreciated that the pooling of incomes allowed them not to work, or at a later stage, to find work while other family members cared for their children. A law passed in 2002, which required sponsor to have independent housing before they could bring in a foreign spouse, made such extended family living arrangements impossible (Liversage & Jakobsen, 2010, p. 711).

Finally, scholars have begun to inquire how family migration policies—which are subject to an increasingly restrictive trend in large parts of Europe—affect the integration of migrant families. First, research has shown that the dependencies and tensions within couples described above are reinforced by migration policies. Income requirements put further pressure on the sponsoring spouse—male or female—to be the “breadwinner,” pushing the migrant spouse into a position of dependency (Eggebo, 2010; Strasser et al., 2009). This dynamic may be reinforced by migration or labor market policies which limit the migrant spouse’s access to paid work (Kraler, 2010a). Also, in most European countries, the residence permit of the migrant spouse is withdrawn if the relationship ends during the first years of residence. Fearing expulsion if they leave their partner or are left by them, migrant spouses may thus be vulnerable to exploitation or abuse as a result of migration law (Liversage, 2013; Strasser et al., 2009).

Second, researchers have attempted to evaluate how specific family migration policy measures have affected the integration process of family migrants. This question is extremely difficult to answer, because integration is a long-term process which is influenced by a multitude of factors (Strik et al., 2013). However, in a study of family migration policies and their effects in six EU member states, Strik et al. (2013) observe that during the time it takes for the sponsor to meet the requirements to bring his or her family members over, and even during the time after arrival when residence permits remain temporary and insecure, the lives of all family members are “on hold.” All the energy goes into the admission and residence procedures rather than into building a new life in the country of residence. Children are affected badly by the delay of family migration as a result of restrictive conditions; their separation from their parent or parents is prolonged, and their language learning and integration process is delayed. Strik et al. (2013, pp. 110-111) conclude that “restrictive measures on the admission and residence of family members have not furthered integration and in many cases have actually impeded it.” Leerkes and Kulu-Glasgow (2011, p. 117) found that as a result of the income requirement of 120% of the minimum wage applied to family migration in the Netherlands from 2004 to 2010, “females and younger men in particular, felt forced to adapt their life course in undesired ways by working more hours than desired, forsaking (part-time) study opportunities, and working in an ‘undesirable’ job.” Other qualitative studies confirm that the need to meet income requirements may negatively affect the labor market integration of both sponsors and family migrants by pushing family members to adopt risk averse employment strategies, such as limiting the duration of job searches in case of unemployment, staying with demanding and unsatisfying jobs below family members’ qualifications, or postponing educational plans and plans for reskilling (Kraler et al., 2013, p. 95f; Liversage, 2009). Schmidt et al. (2009) have studied the effects of Danish marriage migration policy reforms implemented between 2002 and 2004, in particular the rise of the minimum age from 21 to 24 years and the “attachment requirement,” on the integration of second-generation migrants in Denmark. The most significant effect they observe is that young migrant women marry less or later. The marrying age, which had been rising since the 1990s, rose steeply after the minimum age for marriage migration was set at 24 years. Interethnic marriages did not increase, but there was a slight increase in marriages with a Danish partner from the same ethnic group, especially among Turks. The researchers found no evidence that the number of arranged marriages had decreased, nor that the policy reforms had affected the education or employment of second-generation migrants.

Scholars are divided as to the effects of restrictive family migration policies on the number of family migrants coming to European countries. Strik et al. (2013, p. 107) observe that the number of applications and permits granted has “dropped dramatically” and argue that “it is more than likely that the largest part of the drop relates to the restrictive measures introduced in the past decade.” Similarly, Fair (2010, p. 148) states that the 24-year age requirement had the “intended impact” of cutting the number of marriage migrants arriving in Denmark in half. Scholten et al. (2012) observe a decline of family reunions in the Netherlands and Germany especially in the first years after the introduction of the preentry tests in 2006 and 2007 respectively (see also Kraler et al., 2013 on Austria). Scholten et al. (2012) also observe a significant increase in the human capital of family migrants, which is probably a result of self-selection induced by the preentry test and which contributes to achieving at least part of the objectives of the restrictive reform. In a similar vein Carol et al. (2014) find on the basis of a survey of children of Turkish and Moroccan immigrants in six European countries that more restrictive policy frameworks indeed negatively affect the propensity to marry transnationally. In addition, they argue that restrictive policy changes are likely to have lasting, rather than temporary effects. However, Van Kerckem et al. (2013) argue that the decline in transnational marriages among Turkish Belgians “should not necessarily be attributed only to restrictive policies” since a “drastic decline . . . precedes the adoption of restrictive legislation.”

As discussed above, Van Kerckem et al. (2013) attribute the decline in transnational marriages primarily to changes in the attitudes and behavior of young Turkish Belgians and their parents. Aybek (2012) also questions the quantitative impact of restrictive family migration policies. He argues that the “many political attempts” to restrict family migration from Turkey to Germany have not significantly influenced the inflow of spouses and children from the 1970s until today. Therefore, the political debate about restricting family migration should be interpreted as largely “symbolic politics” used to “highlight and preserve the idea that Germany was not an immigration country” (Aybek, 2012, p. 38).

Finally, scholars have raised the question how restrictive family migration policies affect the sense of belonging and emotional and psychological well-being of migrant families, and particularly resident spouses who want to bring in foreign family members. Rytter (2013, pp. 203-204) observes that “the ongoing national securitization of migration has increased the experience of insecurity and uncertainty in immigrants’ everyday lives,” an insecurity which becomes visible, for instance, in increased suspicions of sorcery. The systematic exclusion of Pakistani Danes from the Danish national community in political discourse may lead to a “lack of recognition” and a “feeling of not belonging in the world” (Rytter, 2013, p. 202). Similarly, Wray (2011, pp. 230-235) describes how women and men living in the United Kingdom whose claim to bring over foreign family members is rejected face a “loss of belonging,” as the state denies their entitlement to live their family life in the United Kingdom. Most of the 50 couples interviewed by Leerkes and Kulu Glasgow (2011, p. 117) reported “personal and relational ‘stress’ in connection with the admission procedure.” Strasser et al. (2009, p. 175) find that migrant and binational families resent the state intervention in their family lives, and aspire to shape their life and their family according to their own wishes: “to live together, marry, separate, work, and have and raise children, if and when they so desire.” Those who experience that the laws and actors of the state prohibit them from having an “ordinary family life” (Strasser et al., 2009, p. 175) inevitably adopt a different attitude toward that state, their sense of belonging and citizenship is profoundly affected. In this sense, “family formations have become politics,” as Schmidt (2011) argues, “whom one marries has . . . also become a practice defining who you are as a citizen” (p. 272).

Conclusion

Policy perspectives on family migration and integration participate in the politics of belonging. Migrant families are construed as product and producer of “failed integration,” that is, of “deviant” family norms and practices. This “Otherness” is seen as a threat to the social cohesion and identity of nations, which legitimizes keeping migrant families out through restrictive family migration policies. “Integration” also serves to measure the “membership” of those requesting family migration, and thereby the legitimacy of their claim to live their family life on national territory.

The empirical evidence to sustain these policy assumptions on the relation between family migration and integration is scarce and fragmented. Studies show that intraethnic transnational marriages are much more diverse than policy makers account for. Such unions may be aimed at maintaining ethnic closure and tradition but also be used as an emancipatory strategy. Whether family migrants’ integration prospects are worse than those of other categories of migrants has barely been studied until now. There is some limited evidence that marriage migration may affect the integration of children negatively, and the integration of sponsors neutrally or positively. Finally, the increasingly restrictive family migration policies recently implemented in many European countries have been shown to have a detrimental effect on migrant families’ well-being and integration. Lengthy immigration procedures delay and obstruct migrant families’ life projects, affect their labor market and educational integration strategies negatively, and may lead to emotional distress and tensions within the family. Being denied the opportunity to lead their family lives in their country of residence may undermine the sense of belonging of resident spouses—be they citizens or migrants—and thus negatively affect the social cohesion of European societies.

Contributions to This Special Issue

The first four contributions to this special issue examine family migration policies from a policy perspective, probing into how policies, policy makers, and public officials charged to process family reunion cases construct and frame the relationship between family related admission and integration. The opening contribution by Laura Block puts forward an analytical framework based on the notion of social membership. As Block argues, the various conditions attached to admission on family related grounds can fruitfully be interpreted as instruments to assess different types—and degrees—of membership of both sponsors and incoming family members. Besides any immediate policy aims, family migration policies have an important normative dimension that reflects broader conceptions and reconfigurations of who is considered a (potentially) good member of society. As Block argues, the concept of social membership is particularly appropriate for examining the intersection of class, ethnicity, and gender in the stratification of family migration rights.

The following contribution by Anne Staver examines how family migration policies in Norway have become a tool of selective immigration policy, focusing on the considerable differences between favorable admission requirements for family members of labor migrants and very demanding conditions for the admission of family members of other migrants or, indeed, citizens. Staver finds that open family migration policies vis-à-vis (highly) skilled migrants are part of a larger package to attract skilled labor migrants to Norway, while high-income conditions for other sponsors are justified in terms of deterring forced marriages and asylum related migration as well as ensuring economic self-sufficiency of families. Importantly, both liberal regulations for family migration for skilled migrants and strict requirements for other sponsors follow an economic rationale, pitting the potential economic contribution of beneficiaries of family related admission against the rights of legal insiders, including citizens.

The third contribution to this special issue applies the notion of moral gatekeeping to examine the administrative implementation of family migration policies and the use of discretion by front-desk officers in Finland. Pellander's contribution examines the way in which norms and values inform immigration officers' assessment of the genuineness of marriages. Evaluating the "acceptability" of a marriage is a showcase example of how a more abstract rationale of migration control and fraud prevention intertwines with other societal norms and values, as civil servants assess both the legal acceptability of a marriage for the purpose of family reunion and its social and cultural acceptability. Pellander finds that Finnish immigration officials engage in moral gatekeeping in a complex way, which is sensitive to non-Western practices, but which at the same time rests on an essentialization of expected marriage practices in "other cultures," paradoxically identifying acceptability with expected practices "there" rather than "here."

The last contribution of this first set of articles by Karin Borevi also deals with a Nordic country, Sweden. As Borevi shows, Swedish family migration policies differ markedly from policy approaches taken in other European countries. While the scope of family members eligible for family reunification is similar in Sweden to other European countries' policies, the conditions imposed for family reunification are much more liberal in Sweden than elsewhere. The income requirement, first introduced in 2010, is much lower than in other European countries and only applies to sponsors who have recently migrated to Sweden. Borevi argues that the exceptionally liberal Swedish policy approach is explained by the dominant welfare ideology which emphasizes equal treatment of natives and migrants, as well as by the low degree of politicization and the tendency of mainstream politicians to be concerned about too restrictive, rather than too liberal regulations—a tendency which is highly uncommon elsewhere in Europe.

The second set of articles focuses on the perspective of individuals involved in family related migration and as such affected by family migration policies and by dominant societal discourses on the rights and wrongs of families shaped by migration. Rikke Wagner's article examines cross-border strategies of Danish international couples who have moved to Sweden so as to use EU mobility rights to access family unification, which was inaccessible to them in Denmark due to the particularly restrictive Danish family migration policies. In analyzing individual case studies of couples that moved across the Oresund Bridge to the south of Sweden, Wagner is particularly interested in what "integration" means to couples engaging in such cross-border strategies. She finds that restrictive immigration regulations indeed prevent couples' integration in Denmark, pushing them to seek a shared family life across the border. Yet she also shows that subsequent experiences are diverse and complex and raise a number of questions on the interrelationship between mobility strategies and integration. Thus, couples may ultimately be integrated socially and politically in Sweden, while maintaining economic ties on both sides of the border. For others engaging in cross-border strategies ultimately aims at returning to and settling in Denmark, while for still others it means incorporation in a dynamic and economically integrated cross-border region of Oresund, in a sense making them the living proof of the postnational potential of EU citizenship.

In the following article, Can Aybek examines the impact of the German preintegration tests on temporal and spatial aspects of marriage practices of intraethnic transnational Turkish–German couples. Based on multisited qualitative research with prospective marriage migrants in Turkey and their sponsors in Germany, Aybek finds that the timing of marriage takes on new and highly gendered meanings in the context of the preentry tests. In the case of male prospective marriage migrants, marriage is often postponed to after the successful completion of the preentry tests, while marriage takes place before the start of language course in the case of females, reflecting gendered understandings of commitment and experiences of shame as well gender differences in power and in support expected from fiancé(e)s or spouses during the premigration phase. In addition Aybek observes that the preentry requirements considerably increase the dependency of marriage migrants on their sponsors and other family members. In sum, Aybek's respondents experience the premigration integration requirements as stressful, inappropriate and inefficient.

The final contribution to this issue by Leen Sterckx examines the relationship of integration, partner choice and cross-cultural marriage in the Netherlands. Sterckx takes issue with the equation in policy discourses of intermarriage with integration and couples' orientation toward Dutch values, and as a corollary, the interpretation of coethnic marriage preferences as a sign of failed integration of introspective ethnic communities. As her case studies of couples show, marriage migration also takes place as a result of mixed marriages. Her case study of a devout Muslim Dutch–Moroccan couple highlights that acculturation is not a one-way process, indirectly also pointing at the inaccuracy of the conflation of particular value orientations (e.g., religiousness) with tradition (or by contrast, modernity). Sterckx's article also highlights that rather than personifying a closing gap between social groups, individuals involved in cross-cultural marriages often find themselves torn between their respective families, friends, and wider social networks, who often see their cross-cultural marriage as trespassing.

Acknowledgments

We are indebted to Katherine Charsley, Eleonore Kofman, and Anika Liversage for their helpful comments on an earlier version of this introduction.

Authors' Note

This special issue is the result of a workshop on family migration policies and integration held at the 9th Annual IMISCOE conference, August 28-29, 2011 in Amsterdam.

Declaration of Conflicting Interests

The author(s) declared no potential conflicts of interest with respect to the research, authorship, and/or publication of this article.

Funding

The author(s) disclosed receipt of the following financial support for the research, authorship, and/or publication of this article: The idea for this project emerged in the context of the European Integration Fund funded project "Family Reunification: Barrier or Facilitator to Integration" (Grant Agreement no. Home/2010/EIFX/CA/1772), which also provided financial support to the workshop.

References

- Ackers, L., & Stalford, H. (2004). A community for children? Children, citizenship and internal migration in the EU. Aldershot, England: Ashgate.
- Autant, C. (1995). La tradition au service des transitions. Le mariage des jeunes Turcs dans l'immigration [The tradition in the service of transitions: The marriage of young Turks in immigration]. Migrants-Formation, 101, 168-179.
- Aybek, C. M. (2012). Politics, symbolics, and facts: Migration policies and family migration from Turkey to Germany. Perceptions, 17(2), 37-59.

- Bailey, A., & Boyle, P. (2004). Untying and retying family migration in the New Europe. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 30, 229-242.
- Beck-Gernsheim, E. (2011). The marriage route to migration: Of border artistes, transnational matchmaking and imported spouses. Nordic Journal of Migration Research, 1, 60-68.
- Becker, B. (2011). Cognitive and language skills of Turkish children in Germany: A comparison of the second and third generation and mixed generational groups. International Migration Review, 45, 426-459.
- Bekker, H., Crosgrave, C., & Labor, M. (2013). Family reunification—Barrier or facilitator to integration (Country Report Ireland—2012). Dublin, Ireland: Immigrant Council of Ireland. Retrieved from http://www.immigrantcouncil.ie/images/stories/Final_online_version_Ireland_country_report.pdf
- Bhabha, J., & Shutter, S. (1994). Women's movement: Women under immigration, nationality and refugee law. Oakhill, England: Trentham Books.
- Block, L. (2012). Regulating social membership and family ties: Policy frames on spousal migration in Germany (Unpublished doctoral dissertation). Department of Political and Social Sciences, European University Institute, Florence, Italy.
- Block, L., & Bonjour, S. (2013). Fortress Europe or Europe of rights? The Europeanisation of family migration policies in France, Germany and the Netherlands. European Journal of Migration and Law, 15, 203-224.
- Bonjour, S. (2009). Grens en gezin: Beleidsvorming inzake gezinsmigratie in Nederland, 1955-2005 [Border and family: Policymaking on family migration in the Netherlands, 1955-2005]. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Aksant.
- Bonjour, S. (2010). Between integration provision and selection mechanism: Party politics, judicial constraints, and the making of French and Dutch policies of civic integration abroad. European Journal of Migration and Law, 12, 299-318.
- Bonjour, S., & Block, L. (2014). Ethnicized membership. The decreasing family migration rights of citizens in France, Germany, and the Netherlands. Paper presented at the Seminar on Marriage Migration, Copenhagen, Denmark.
- Bonjour, S., & de Hart, B. (2013). A proper wife, a proper marriage: Constructions of “us” and “them” in Dutch family migration policy. European Journal of Women's Studies, 20, 61-76.
- Boyle, P. J., Cooke, T. J., Halfacree, K. H., & Smith, D. (2001). A cross-national comparison of the impact of family migration on women's employment status. Demography, 38, 201-213.
- Carol, S., Ersanilli, E., & Wagner, M. (2014). Spousal choice among the children of Turkish and Moroccan immigrants in six European countries: Transnational spouse or co-ethnic migrant? International Migration Review, 48, 387-414. doi:10.1111/imre.12068
- Çelikaksoy, A., Sykt Nielsen, H., & Verner, M. (2006). Marriage migration: Just another case of positive assortative matching? Review of Economics of the Household, 4, 253-275.
- Chaloff, J. (2013, November). Global trends in family migration in the OECD. Paper presented at the conference “Adapting to changes in Family migration: The - experience of OECD countries,” Washington, DC. Retrieved from <http://www.oecd.org/els/mig/Chaloff.pdf>

- Charsley, K. (2005). Unhappy husbands: Masculinity and migration in transnational Pakistani marriages. Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute, 11, 85-105.
- Charsley, K. (2012). Transnational marriage. In K. Charsley (Ed.), Transnational marriage: New perspectives from Europe and beyond (pp. 3-22). London, England: Routledge.
- Chauvin, S., Garcés-Mascreñas, B., & Kraler, A. (2013). Working for legality: Employment and migrant regularization in Europe. International Migration, 51(6), 118-131.
- Chiswick, B. R., Liang Lee, Y., & Miller, P. W. (2006). Immigrants' language skills and visa category. International Migration Review, 40, 419-450.
- Collet, B., Philippe, C., & Santelli, E. (2008). Emergence de la question du “mariage forcé” dans l'espace public en France [Emergence of the issue of “forced marriage” in public space in France]. Retrieved from <http://terra.rezo.net/article809.html>.
- Constable, N. (2005). Introduction: Cross-border marriages, gendered mobility, and global hypergamy. In N. Constable (Ed.), Cross-border marriages: Gender and mobility in transnational Asia (pp. 1-16). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Creese, G., Dyck, I., & McLaren, A. T. (2011). The problem of “human capital.” Gender, place and immigrant household strategies of reskilling in Vancouver. In A. Kraler, E. Kofman, M. Kohli, & C. Schmoll (Eds.), Gender, generations and the family in international migration (pp. 141-162). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press.
- Dale, A. (2008). Migration, marriage and employment amongst Indian, Pakistani and Bangladeshi residents in the UK (CCSR Working Paper 2008-02). Retrieved from <http://www.cmist.manchester.ac.uk/medialibrary/archive-publications/working-papers/2008/2008-02-migration-marriage-and-employment.pdf>
- de Hart, B. (2003). Onbezonnen vrouwen: Gemengde relaties in het nationaliteitsrecht en het vreemdelingenrecht [Brash women: Mixed relationships in nationality law and immigration law]. Amsterdam, Netherlands: Aksant.
- de Hart, B. (2006). The morality of Maria Toet: Gender, citizenship, and the construction of the nation-state. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 32, 49-68.
- de Hart, B. (2009). Love thy neighbour: Family reunification and the rights of insiders. European Journal of Migration and Law, 11, 235-252.
- de Hart, B., & van Oers, R. (2006). European trends in nationality law. In R. Bauböck, E. Ersbøll, K. Gronendijk, & H. Waldrauch (Eds.), Acquisition and loss of nationality: Comparative analysis (Vol. 1, pp. 316-357). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press
- De Valk, H., Liefbroer, A. C., Esveldt, I., & Henkens, K. (2004). Family formation and cultural integration among migrants in the Netherlands. Genus, 60(3/4), 9-35.
- Eggebo, H. (2010). The problem of dependency. Immigration, gender, and the welfare state. Social Politics, 17, 295-322.

- Eggebo, H. (2013). A real marriage? Applying for marriage migration to Norway. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 39, 773-789.
- Fair, L. (2010). "Why can't I get married?"—Denmark and the "Twenty-four year law." Social & Cultural Geography, 11, 139-153.
- Fonseca, M. L. (2008). Defining "family" and bringing it together: The ins and outs of family reunification in Portugal. In R. Grillo (Ed.), The family in question: Immigrant and ethnic minorities in multicultural Europe (pp. 89-111). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press.
- Gedalof, I. (2007). Unhomely homes: Women, family and belonging in UK discourses of migration and asylum. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 33, 77-94.
- González Ferrer, A. (2006). Why do immigrants marry? Partner choice among single immigrants in Germany. European Sociological Review, 22, 171-185.
- Grillo, R. (2008). The family in dispute: Insiders and outsiders. In R. Grillo (Ed.), The family in question: Immigrant and ethnic minorities in multicultural Europe (pp. 15-35). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press.
- Hooghiemstra, E. (2003). Trouwen over de grens. Achtergronden van partnerkeuze van Turken en Marokkanen in Nederland [Getting married across the border: Backgrounds of the partner choice of Turks and Moroccans in the Netherlands]. The Hague, Netherlands: Sociaal en Cultureel Planbureau.
- International Labour Organization. (1999). International Labour Conference, 87th Session, Migrant Workers, Report III (1B). Retrieved from <http://www.ilo.org/public/english/standards/relm/ilc/ilc87/r3-1b.htm>
- Jayaweera, H. (2012). Migration, integration and transnational involvement: Muslim family migrants in urban areas in Britain. In K. Charsley (Ed.), Transnational marriage: New perspectives from Europe and beyond (pp. 81-104). London, England: Routledge.
- Kalter, F., & Schroedter, J. H. (2010). Transnational marriage among former labour migrants in Germany. Journal of Family Research, 22, 11-36.
- Kofman, E. (2004). Family-related migration: A critical review of European studies. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 30, 243-262.
- Kofman, E., Kraler, A., Kohli, M., & Schmoll, C. (2011). Introduction. Issues and debates on family-related migration and the migrant family: A European perspective. In A. Kraler, E. Kofman, M. Kohli, & C. Schmoll (Eds.), Gender, generations and the family in international migration (pp. 13-54). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press.
- Kofman, E., Saharso, S., & Vacchelli, E. (2013). Gendered perspectives on integration measures and discourses. International Migration. Advance online publication. doi:10.1111/imig.12102
- Kraler, A. (2010a). Civic stratification, gender and family migration policies in Europe (Final Report). Vienna, Austria: ICMPD/BMWF. Retrieved from http://research.icmpd.org/fileadmin/Research-Website/Test_content/FINAL_Report_Family_Migration_Policies_Online_FINAL.pdf
- Kraler, A. (2010b). Ein umkämpftes Terrain: Familienmigration und Familie Migrationspolitik [A contested terrain: Family migration and family migration

- policy]. In H. Langthaler (Ed.), Integration in Österreich: Sozialwissenschaftliche Befunde [Integration in Austria: Social science findings] (pp. 64-103). Innsbruck, Austria: StudienVerlag.
- Kraler, A. (2011). Fixing, adjusting, regulating, protecting human rights: The shifting uses of regularisations in the European Union. European Journal of Migration and Law, 13, 297-316.
- Kraler, A., Hollomey, C., Hurich, C., König, A., & Muzak, G. (2013). Family reunification: A barrier or facilitator of integration? (Country Report Austria). Vienna, Austria: ICMPD. Retrieved from http://research.icmpd.org/fileadmin/Research-Website/Project_material/Family_Reunification{EIF/Austria1.pdf
- Kraler, A., Reichel, D., König, A., Baldwin-Edwards, M., & Şimşek, M. (2014). Feasibility study on the labour market trajectories of regularised immigrants within the European Union (REGANE I) (Final Report). Vienna, Austria: ICMPD.
- Lavanchy, A. (2013). L'amour aux services de l'état civil: Régulations institutionnelles de l'intimité et fabrique de la ressemblance nationale en Suisse [Love at the civil registration service: Institutional regulations of intimacy and the construction of national resemblance in Switzerland]. Migrations Société, 25, 61-77.
- Leerkes, A., & Kulu-Glasgow, I. (2011). Playing hard(er) to get: The state, international couples, and the income requirement. European Journal of Migration and Law, 13, 95-121.
- Lievens, J. (1999). Family-forming migration from Turkey and Morocco to Belgium: The demand for marriage partners from the countries of origin. International Migration Review, 33, 717-744.
- Livingsage, A. (2009). Life below a "language threshold"? Stories of Turkish marriage migrant women in Denmark. European Journal of Women's Studies, 16, 229-247.
- Livingsage, A. (2012). Gender, conflict and subordination within the household: Turkish migrant marriage and divorce in Denmark. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 38, 1119-1136.
- Livingsage, A. (2013). Gendered struggles over residency rights when Turkish immigrant marriages break up. Oñati Socio-Legal Series, 3, 1070-1090.
- Livingsage, A., & Jakobsen, V. (2010). Sharing space: Gendered patterns of extend household living among young Turkish marriage migrants in Denmark. Journal of Comparative Family Studies, 41, 693-715.
- Lucassen, L. (2005). The immigrant threat: The integration of old and new migrants in Western Europe since 1850. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Maskens, M. (2013a). L'amour et ses frontières: Régulations étatiques et migrations de mariage (Belgique, France, Suisse et Italie) [Love and its borders: State regulations and marriage migrations (Belgium, France, Switzerland, and Italy)]. Migrations Société, 25, 43-60.
- Maskens, M. (2013b, April). "Subversive Love": How do municipal registrar officers distinguish real from fake marriages in Brussels. Paper presented at the conference Intimate Migrations, Roskilde University, Copenhagen, Denmark.
- Messinger, I. (2011). Historischer Streifzug zum Rechtskonstruk "Scheinehe" [Historical investigation of the legal construct "sham marriage"]. In A. Pilgram, L.

- Boellinger, M. Jasch, S. Krasmann, C. Prittwitz, H. Reinke, & D. Rzepka (Eds.), Einheitliches Recht fuer die Vielfalt der Kulturen? Strafrecht und Kriminologie in Zeiten transkultureller Gesellschaften und transnationalen Rechts [Uniform law for the diversity of cultures? Criminal law and criminology in times of trans-cultural societies and transnational law] (pp. 359-379). Berlin, Germany: LIT Verlag.
- Messinger, I. (2012). Schein oder Nicht Schein. Konstruktion und Kriminalisierung von "Scheinehen" in Geschichte und Gegenwart [Sham or not sham: Construction and criminalization of "sham marriages" in the past and present]. Vienna, Austria: Mandelbaum.
- Myrdahl, E. M. (2010). Legislating love: Norwegian family reunification law as a racial project. Social & Cultural Geography, 11, 103-116.
- Nannestad, P. (2007). Immigration and welfare states: A survey of 15 years of research. European Journal of Political Economy, 23, 512-532.
- Oliveira, O. R., Cancela, J., & Fonseca, V. (2013) Family reunification in Portugal in law and practice. Lisbon, Portugal: ACIDI. Retrieved from http://www.oi.acidi.gov.pt/docs/pdf/rf/2013_rf_longo_pt.pdf
- Olwig, K. F. (2011). "Integration": Migrants and refugees between Scandinavian welfare societies and family relations. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 37, 179-196.
- Palriwala, R., & Uberoi, P. (2008). Exploring the links: Gender issues in marriage and migration. In R. Palriwala & P. Uberoi (Eds.), Marriage, migration and gender (pp. 23-60). London, England: Sage.
- Piper, N., & Roces, M. (2003). Introduction: Marriage and migration in an age of globalization. In N. Piper & M. Roces (Eds.), Wife or worker? Asian women and migration (pp. 1-22). Boulder, CO: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Raissiguier, C. (2013). Blood matters. Sarkozy's immigration policies and their gendered impact. In M. Schrover & D. M. Moloney (Eds.), Gender, migration and categorisation: Making distinctions between migrants in western countries, 1945-2010 (pp. 175-192). Amsterdam, Netherlands: Amsterdam University Press.
- Rytter, M. (2013). Family upheaval: Generation, mobility and relatedness among Pakistani migrants in Denmark. New York, NY: Berghahn Books.
- Schmidt, G. (2011). Law and identity. Transnational arranged marriages and the boundaries of Danishness. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 37, 257-275.
- Schmidt, G., Krogh Graversen, B., Jakobsen, V., Gudrun Jensen, T., & Livsage, A. (2009). New regulations on family reunification. what have the new regulations meant for patterns in partner selection by ethnic minorities?. Copenhagen: SFI - The Danish National Centre for Social Research.
- Scholten, P., Entzinger, H., Kofman, E., Hollomey, C., & Lechner, C. (2012). Integration from abroad? perception and impacts of pre-entry tests for third-country nationals. PROSINT Comparative Reports WP4. Retrieved from: http://research.icmpd.org/fileadmin/Research-Website/Project_material/PROSINT/Reports/WP4_CompRep_Final_submitted.pdf
- Shaw, A., & Charsley, K. (2006). Rishtas: Adding emotion to strategy in understanding British Pakistani transnational marriages. Global Networks, 6, 405-421.

- Smits, J. (1999). Family migration and the labour-force participation of married women in the Netherlands, 1977–1996. International Journal of Population Geography, 5, 133-150.
- Straßburger, G. (2003). Heiratsverhalten und Partnerwahl im Einwanderungskontext: Eheschliessungen der zweiten Migrantengeneration tuerkischer Herkunft [Marriage behavior and partner choice in the immigration context: Marriages of second generation migrants of Turkish origin]. Würzburg: Ergon Verlag.
- Strasser, E., Kraler, A., Bonjour, S., & Bilger, V. (2009). Doing family: Responses to state constructions of “the migrant family” across Europe. History of the Family, 14, 165-176.
- Strik, T., de Hart, B., & Nissen, E. (2013). Family reunification: A barrier or facilitator of integration? A comparative study. Dublin, Ireland: Immigrant Council of Ireland. Retrieved from <http://www.oi.acidi.gov.pt/docs/pdf/rf/FamilyReunificationSummary-web.pdf>
- Timmerman, C. (2006). Gender dynamics in the context of Turkish marriage migration: The case of Belgium. Turkish Studies, 7, 125-143.
- Timmerman, C., & Wets, J. (2011). Marriage migration and the labour market. Nordic Journal of Migration Research, 1, 69-79.
- Van Kerckem, K., Van der Bracht, K., Van de Putte, B., & Stevens, P. A. J. (2013). Transnational marriages on the decline: Explaining changing trends in partner choice among Turkish Belgians. International Migration Review, 47, 1006-1038.
- Van Walsum, S. K. (2008). The family and the nation: Dutch family migration policies in the context of changing family norms. Newcastle Upon Tyne, England: Cambridge Scholars.
- Wray, H. (2006). An ideal husband? Marriages of convenience, moral gate-keeping and immigration to the UK. European Journal of Migration and Law, 8, 303-320.
- Wray, H. (2009). Moulding the migrant family. Legal Studies, 29, 592-618.
- Wray, H. (2011). Regulating marriage migration into the UK: A stranger in the home. Farnham, England: Ashgate.