The parameters of constitutional conflict after Melloni

Besselink, L.F.M.

Published in:
European Current Law

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: http://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.
European Current Law
Subscriptions 2014
Twelve Issues and Year Book: United Kingdom £1,578; Europe €2,231; Rest of the World £1,649; $2,864.

All editorial enquiries should be addressed to:
European Current Law, Sweet & Maxwell, The Hatchery, Hall Bank Lane, Mytholmroyd, West Yorkshire, HX7 5HQ.

All subscription enquiries should be addressed to:
Sweet & Maxwell, PO Box 1000, Andover, SP10 9AF.
Tel: 0845 600 9555.

Tel: 0845 600 9355.

ISSN 0956-0037

© 2014 Thomson Reuters (Professional) UK Limited

European Current Law is published and typeset by Thomson Reuters (Professional) UK Limited trading as Sweet & Maxwell, Friars House, 160 Blackfriars Road, London, SE1 1RF (Registered in England & Wales, Company No.1679046). Registered Office and address for service: 2nd floor, Aldgate House, 33 Aldgate High Street, London, EC3N 1DL.

For further information on our products and services, visit:
http://www.sweetmaxwell.co.uk.

Thomson Reuters and the Thomson Reuters Logo are trademarks of Thomson Reuters. Sweet & Maxwell® is a registered trademark of Thomson Reuters (Professional) UK Limited.

Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of HMSO and the Queen’s Printer for Scotland.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, transmitted in any form, or by any means, or stored in any retrieval system of any nature, without prior written permission, except for permitted fair dealing under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, or in accordance with the terms of a licence issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency in respect of photocopying and/or reprographic reproduction. Application for permission for other use of copyright material, including permission to reproduce extracts in other published works, shall be made to the publishers. Full acknowledgement of the author, publisher and source must be given.

Printed and bound in Great Britain by Hobbs the Printers Ltd, Totton, Hampshire.

No natural forests were destroyed to make this product; only farmed timber was used and replanted.

CALL FOR EUROPEAN CURRENT LAW CONTRIBUTORS

We would like to hear from any lawyers and academics interested in contributing to European Current Law. Please send a copy of your CV, together with an indication of the jurisdictions that you are interested in covering, to the following address:

European Current Law
Sweet & Maxwell
The Hatchery
Hall Bank Lane
Mytholmroyd
West Yorkshire
HX7 5HQ

For the attention of Sally Rea.
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
Maria Theresia Bio
Attorney at Law
Studio Legale Bio, Bari

Kristina Christou, LL.B. (Athens)
G.M. (University)
Legal Adviser

Karina Ruth Sybilla Ejggaard
Tax, VAT and Legal Manager, Court of KPMG Copenhagen

Giampiero Finesi
M.D. (University), L.L.D.,
Barrister

Dr Olga Kalousa
LL.M. (London), Ph.D.,
Associate Professor, Institute of Trade and Laws, Moscow

Dr Thomas Kuhert
LL.M. (Hamburg), Ph.D.,
Assistent Federal Ministry of Economic Affairs

Matthet Balsis
LL.M. (London)
Permanent Meeting Secretary

Anna Labedzka
Ph.D. Candidate
The City Law School, City University London

Dr Konstantinos D Lagklaras
Assistant Professor in Law,
University of the Anglia, Attorney-at-Law, Athens

Marina Melino, Lm. (Bari)
P.E. (Bari) (Pero), Solicitor

Suzanne Weriska, LL.M. (London),
Advocate (Germany), Solicitor

Bo Knobbel Petersen, LL.M. (Copenhagen)
Counsel

Head Legal Counsel, Danish Offices and Property Agency

Index

References

FOCUS
The Parameters of Constitutional Conflict after Melloni

LEGISLATION, CASES, ARTICLES
Digests of Legislation, Cases and Articles

REFERENCE SECTION
Legislation Recently Passed
European Union
International

Lists
Table of Treaty Provisions Referred to List of Legislation Digested
List of Cases

Index

Issue 10 reports may be cited as: [2014] 10 Euro. C.L.
FOCUS

The Parameters of Constitutional Conflict after Melloni

Leonard F.M. Besselink
Chair of Constitutional Law, Amsterdam Centre of European Law and Governance, University of Amsterdam

Abstract

Melloni makes clear that primacy of EU law is not about citizens’ rights: even the core of their constitutional rights under national law has to be set aside in favour of the “primacy, unity and effectiveness” of EU law. Melloni extends the duty to set aside citizens’ constitutional rights also to EU law that is not directly effective. The court finds it acceptable that a framework decision that “harmonizes” fundamental rights and falls short of the constitutional standards of a Member State must override constitutional rights if that EU act lives up to the minimum standards of the ECHR in abstract terms. This reopens a path to constitutional conflict in the area of fundamental rights protection that was expected to be closed since the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty. The court’s reasoning shows few signs of authentic “constitutional dialogue”, by ignoring the fact that Melloni involved the core of a constitutional right affecting human dignity under Spanish constitutional law. Once again, Melloni also illustrates that constitutional conflict is not merely a matter between a Member State and the Court of Justice, but may exist also between Member State courts and executives, thus making the Court of Justice an arbiter of national constitutional conflict. The Spanish Constitutional Court, in its follow-up judgment, has refused to accept either the constitutional supremacy of EU law or, by implication, the Court of Justice unreserved position on art.53 of the Charter, but managed to avoid actual and overt constitutional conflict by an overall lowering of its autonomous fundamental rights standard. Such practical backing off can hardly be expected to occur with constitutional courts with nationally stronger positions of legitimacy in more general constitutional terms. Melloni can be understood in the context of competing paradigms of rights, power and the relations between constitutional orders.

Introduction

European integration was the way to overcome the devastation that sovereign powers had brought Europe over centuries. The rationale to overcome the habits of sovereignty largely coincided with that of post-war constitutionalism in the European state orders. The constitutional concerns with power arrangements for the exercise of authority that dominated the “long 19th century” was to be offset by the paradigm of citizens’ rights that came to dominate the post-war 20th century discourse, also that of EU law. The European Union is there primarily for its citizens and integration is realised through their rights. This is how the history of the Court of Justice’s core case, from Van Gend & Loos and Costa v ENEL to the enunciation of European citizenship as destined to be “the fundamental status of citizens (Grzelczyk) and its progeny”, is usually read. If this were a correct reading, the protection of citizens’ fundamental rights would be of prime concern to the Court of Justice. We know, of course, that things are slightly more subtle, both historically and presently. And Melloni1 confirms this.

1 This article was first produced by Thomson Reuters (Professional) UK Limited in European Law Review (2014) 39 E.L.R. 321.
2 Grzelczyk v Ministero dei Lavoro (C-399/11) [2013] 2 C.M.L.R. 45.
3 Melloni v Ministero Dei Lavoro (C-399/11) [2013] 2 C.M.L.R. 45.
Fundamental rights protection was originally a matter on which national constitutional courts held the European Court of Justice to account: the Court of Justice lawfully recognized them to be protected by EU law. However, EU law is not self-standing; it provides fundamental rights protection that was either substantively, or as to the level of judicial scrutiny, equivalent to that provided by the national courts or by the European Court of Human Rights. In so far as the Union would not provide such protection, EU law could not provide legal effect distinctively: in modern post-war European constitutionalism, only law that respects fundamental rights can be valid and effective. The Bundesverfassungsgericht marked off this area of potential constitutional conflict, and Sweden codified it in its Constitution, while many Member States either implicitly or explicitly supported the view that EU law must also respect fundamental rights standards to which autonomous, national Member State acts are subject. Since the Court of Justice began protecting ECtHR in accordance with minimum Strasbourg standards, it now recognizes that an infringement of EU fundamental rights must be considered as a breach of the Charter of Fundamental Rights in national jurisdictions. Whenever Member State authorities act within the scope of EU law, they must observe EU fundamental rights—this is the unanimous message of Åkerberg Fricsson.

From the perspective of the protection of rights, this would appear to be a good thing: power is offset by rights—unless, of course, the standard of EU fundamental rights falls short of the national standard. In that case, we are back at the historical starting position: EU law does not guarantee rights as it is protected in a Member State but, to the contrary, infringes fundamental rights—power exercised by Member State authorities is no longer offset by the rights that citizens enjoy in the national legal order. Theoretically, the conflict could be solved by taking the route of the substantive values of constitutionalism, that is, by allowing for higher national standards, as is normally the case under international human rights law, and as, in one reading of this provision, would follow from art.53 of the Charter. However, the Melloni judgment of the Court of Justice of February 26, 2014, rejects that reading and holds that art.53 cannot allow for higher levels of national protection if this interferes with the privacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law, thus reducing art.53's meaning to insignificance. Thus, also the court reopens the field of constitutional conflict as concerns fundamental rights protection—unless, of course, constitutional courts are willing to reduce the standards of fundamental rights protection, if even, then, leave power to be reined: the Court of Justice holds national authorities, including courts, to account as to the protection they provide for EU fundamental rights in national jurisdictions. If we hold that our fundamental rights are a matter of constitutional law, then the protection of these rights is a matter of constitutional law.

In this context comment, the ruling in Melloni is summarized, critically analyzed and commented on from the perspective of relations between constitutional orders. To that purpose:

1 This did not occur until Harvard Constitutional Comment (C-274/99 PJ) [2001] ECR-I-6413, [2001] 1 C.M.L.R. 58.

3 Åkerberg Fricsson [C-63/10] [2011] 2 C.M.L.R. 46, on which see P. Wattel and L. van Rooden, "New Ways into Old Whores: the Scope of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU after Åkerberg Fricsson" [2013] 31 J.L. Rev. 866. For an attempt to differentiate the scope of EU law and the scope of the Charter, now rejected in France, see e.g. C. Lauberger, "European Union International Inference" in The Protection of Fundamental Rights Post-Lisbon: The Interaction between the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the European Law, the International and National Constitutions (Tutro University Press, Reports of the XXXII Heidelberg Congress, Tallinn, 2012), vol.1, para.35.1.4, p.168.

4 ECHR art.5: "Nothing in this Convention shall be construed as limiting or diminishing any of the human rights and fundamental freedoms which may be enjoyed under the law of any High Contracting Party or any other convention, regulation or custom existing at the present, as to which the present Contracting State is, or has been, a signatory to, and which it has not denounced or renounced, or which the present Contracting State is willing to admit to, if the said provisions, regulations or customs exist or consist in the present Contracting State of which the present Contracting State does not (never has not) recognise such rights or in such a manner that it (never has not) recognises them in a manner consistent with the present Convention." For an attempt to differentiate between the human rights and fundamental freedoms which may be enjoyed under the law of any High Contracting Party or any other convention, regulation or custom, see R. de Witte, "Article 57" in G.P. Tovey, T. Hayeby, J. Kessler and A. Ward (eds.), The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights: A Commentary (Oxford/ Oxford University Press, C.H. Beck/Heinonline, 2013), p.526; id.; Opinion of AG2, in Melloni (C-399/12) [2013] 2 C.M.L.R. 45 at 1394.

Facts

Johannes Melloni is a swinekeeper who set up financial investment schemes in which the savings of some 1,800 persons are reported to have disappeared. Melloni also disappeared for a while. In his absence, he was convicted to 18 years imprisonment, subsequently reduced to 10 years owing to the introduction of statutory limitations, a conviction confirmed in appeal and in cassation. After he had at last been arrested, his surrender to Italy was requested for execution of the prison sentence under a European Arrest Warrant in August 2008. This surrender was consented to by the Audiencia Nacional (Spanish High Court). This court rejected Melloni's contention that his rights to a fair trial under art.24(2) of the Spanish Constitution had been infringed, Melloni claiming, first, that he had revoked the appointment of the advocates that had defended him at first instance and, secondly, that his surrender should have been made conditional on the possibility of retrial. Melloni subsequently filed a constitutional complaint at the Spanish Constitutional Court, the Tribunal Constitutional, asserting that his rights of defense under art.24(2) of the Spanish Constitution were infringed, on the same grounds involved at the High Court.

Spanish constitutional protection of the right to a fair trial

(Under the case law of the Tribunal Constitutional, the right to be present at a criminal trial is an essential part of the right to a fair trial and to defence [art.24(2) of the Constitution]. The Spanish Constitutional Court had established that constitutional rights also have effect in relation to institutions external to the Spanish legal order, but in the case of an allegation of such an "indirect" infringement by an external authority, the threshold for establishing an infringement is higher: it must concern the very core of the right in a manner that affects human dignity. In Melloni the Constitutional Court had established that the right to a fair trial would be infringed if it was held that his surrender was required and, in this manner if the right to be present in criminal trials were be denied in cases of very serious offences; and, hence, extradition or surrender of a person to a country there is otherwise no right to a retrial after trial in absentia would have to be made conditional on allowing for retrial of the person extradited or surrendered. The denial of the right to be present at a trial and the lack of a right to retrial in such cases were considered to touch the core of the right to a fair trial, affecting human dignity. This was at stake in the case of Melloni in Italy; there is also a right to a retrial after conviction in absentia for a serious offence. The question thus arises whether Framework Decision 2002/584 on the European Arrest Warrant, which does not explicitly allow for making the surrender conditional on retrial, precludes such a condition in order to guarantee the rights of defence of the person surrendered.

The EAW Framework Decision

Framework Decision 2002/584 in its original version allowed, in principle, making surrender for execution of a conviction conditional on the possibility of retrial in cases of trial in absentia [art.5(1)]. Significant differences in legal traditions regarding trial in absentia—what is regular practice in one Member State is constitutionally barred in another—were reason to replace this provision with another set of more precise provisions of the amending Framework Decision 2009/299.

The amended Framework Decision specifies the conditions under which conviction in a trial in absentia cannot constitute a reason for non-surrender of the convicted person (art.4(a)(1) of the amended EAW Framework Decision). The surrender of the person cannot be refused—among other things—in the following circumstances:

- the person was unequivocally aware of the scheduled trial, of the date and place of it, and of the fact that a conviction may follow also in this person's absence;
- the person was defended by legal counsel whom he or she had mandated, appointed either by the person concerned or by the State.

In the case of Mr Melloni, these grounds were relevant: on that basis, his surrender must take place with no right to retrial, a situation that was unconstitutional under Spanish law.

The questions referred to the European Court of Justice

The first of the Tribunal Constitutionals’s three questions was whether Framework Decision 2002/584 on the European Arrest Warrant, which does not explicitly allow for making the surrender conditional on retrial, precludes such a condition in order to guarantee the fundamental rights of defence of the person surrendered. Secondly, if the EAW Framework Decision does preclude such a condition, it was asked whether this is compatible with the right to a fair trial and the rights of defence under arts 47 and 48 of the Charter.

The third and final question posed would be relevant if the Framework Decision were to be judged compatible with the Charter, and it concerned art.53 of the Charter. This provision reads as follows:

"Level of protection

Nothing in this Charter shall be interpreted as restricting or adversely affecting human rights and fundamental freedoms as recognised, in their respective fields of application, by Union law and international law and by international agreements to which the Union or all the Member States are party, including the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and by the Member States' constitutions."

The Tribunal Constitutional asked whether this provision allows a Member State,

"to make the surrender of a person convicted in absentia conditional upon the conviction being open to review in the requesting State, thus affecting the right to a fair trial and the rights of defence of the person surrendered."

Essentially, this question concerns the exhaustiveness of the list of cases in which the national court must execute the arrest warrant in the absence of the right of retrial in the requesting State (art.4(a)(1) under (a) and (b)). From the judgment of the Spanish Constitutional Court by which this question was referred—the first reference in its history—it appears that the referring court did not wish to challenge the exhaustiveness of the list of cases of actual non-surrender as such, but only the exceptional situation of conditioning the surrender under circumstances in which the application would lead to an infringement of fundamental rights protected under primary EU law, as the Framework Decision itself provides that it "shall not have the effect of modifying the obligation to respect fundamental rights and fundamental legal principles as enshrined in Article 6 of the Treaty, including the right of defence of persons subject to criminal proceedings, and any obligations incumbent upon judicial authorities in this respect shall remain unaffected." (Framework Decision 2009/299 art.1(2).)
So, in reality, the question posed was whether the necessity of protecting fundamental rights could be considered as a general condition for the application of art.4(a)(1) of the Framework Decision. This is not an odd question. After all, the Framework Decision itself claims that it does not preclude the application of fundamental rights, which are, as the Spanish Constitutional Court emphasises, primary rules to which secondary law (the Framework Decision) is subject. All application of secondary EU law is subject to its being in conformity with fundamental rights. Thus viewed, pieces of legislation of exclusive harmonisation are also always subject to an unwritten exception if they would lead under a particular set of circumstances to an infringement of fundamental rights. In other words, the Spanish Constitutional Court posed a question like that addressed in NO: does mutual recognition allow for fundamental rights exceptions not explicitly provided for in secondary legislation? This is a controversial question in EU law since, as is commonly held, it potentially undermines the notion of mutual recognition and restricts the extent of primary law.

The Court of Justice sidesteps the issue by rephrasing the question, leaving out entirely the referring court’s explicit reference to the fundamental rights conditionality of secondary law and its application, saying that:

"The Tribunal Constitutional asks, in essence, whether Article 4(a)(1) of Framework Decision 2002/584 must be interpreted as precluding the execution judicial authorities, in the circumstances specified in that provision, from making the execution of a European arrest warrant issued for the purposes of executing a sentence conditional upon the conviction rendered in absentia being open to review in the issuing Member State." 11

The court’s answer relies heavily on Baha, in which the court did not want to know about fundamental rights conditionality.12 In Meloni, it reiterates that the EAW’s objective is that of replacing a multilateral system of extradition with a simplified and more effective system based on a high degree of confidence that should exist between Member States. The Framework Decision consequently only allows refusal of the execution of a warrant in cases of mandatory non-execution explicitly provided for: The executing judicial authority may make the execution of a European arrest warrant subject solely to the conditions set out in the Framework Decision. Relying itself on the wording of the optional ground for non-execution of a European Arrest Warrant provided in art.4(a)(1), the court concludes that the provision precludes "making the surrender of a person convicted in absentia conditional upon the conviction being open to review in the issuing Member State." 13

The court seeks further confirmation of this "literal interpretation" in the specific objective of the new art.4(a), which is to restrict the opportunities for refusing to execute an arrest warrant and to harmonise the grounds for non-recognition of judgments, allowing "the executing authority to execute the decision despite the absence of the person at the trial, while fully respecting the person’s right of defence." Surrender can hence not be made subject to a refusal in the issuing Member State, if the person was aware of the trial while absent or has given a mandate to the legal counsel that defended him or her during that trial.14

Although the court’s rephrasing of the question polished it away, the issue of fundamental rights could not be totally avoided either. The court removes away, however, the possibility of secondary law being applied in conformity with fundamental rights beyond the text of the Framework Decision, by holding—with reference to the Opinion of the Advocate General—that the EU legislature’s providing for:

13 Meloni (C-399/11)(2012) 2 C.M.L.R. 43 at [55].
15 Metropolitan Police (C-569/13) [2014] 2 C.M.L.R. 43 at [60]-[61].
16 Meloni (C-399/11)(2012) 2 C.M.L.R. 43 at [41]-[43].

European Current Law Issue 10 2014

174
This is, the court states, in keeping with ECtHR case-law,20 and the court confirms the stated objective of the preceding Framework Decision "to enhance the procedural rights of persons subject to criminal proceedings whilst improving mutual recognition of judicial decisions between Member States". On this basis, the court concludes:

"Article 4(a)(1) and (b) of Framework Decision 2002/584 lays down the circumstances in which the person concerned must be deemed to have waived, voluntarily and unambiguously, his right to be present at his trial, with the result that the execution of a European arrest warrant issued for the purposes of exercising the sentence of a person convicted in absentia cannot be made subject to the condition that that person may claim the benefit of a retrial at which he is present in the issuing Member State."21

The court then immediately concludes from this that art.4(a)(1) "does not disregard" the right to an effective remedy and the rights of defence under arts 47 and 48(2) of the Charter and is therefore compatible with these provisions.22

Apparently, the court derives the element of a "voluntary and unambiguous" waiver by the convicted person from the case law of the ECtHR, since it is not in the text of art.4(a)(1) of the Framework Decision (which speaks in various places only about "unequivocally" waiving one's right to be present, which does not necessarily imply "voluntarily" waiving that right).

Does Article 53 of the Charter allow Spain's higher level of protection to apply?

Whereas the referring Constitutional Court presented three interpretations of art.53 of the Charter,23 the Court of Justice cuts the judicial dialogue short and dismisses out of hand any interpretation which would allow a Member State to apply the standard protection of fundamental rights guaranteed by its constitution when that standard is higher than that deriving from the Charter and, where necessary, to give it priority over the application of provisions of EU law. According to the court, any such reading aims to subject surrender "to conditions intended to avoid an interpretation which restricts or adversely affects fundamental rights recognised by its constitution, even though the application of such conditions is not allowed under Article 4(a1) of Framework Decision 2002/584".24 This the court cannot accept:

"That interpretation of Article 53 of the Charter would undermine the principle of the primacy of EU law inasmuch as it would allow a Member State to disapply EU legal rules which are fully in compliance with the Charter where they infringe the fundamental rights guaranteed by that State's constitution. It is settled case-law that, by virtue of the principle of primacy of EU law, which is an essential feature of the EU legal order (see Opinion 1/91 [1991] ECR I-6879, paragraph 21, and Opinion 1/99 [2011] ECR I-1137, paragraph 45), rules of national law, even of a constitutional order, cannot be allowed to undermine the effectiveness of EU law on the territory of that State (see, to that effect, inter alia, Case 117/70 International Handelsgesellschaft [1970] ECR 1125, paragraph 3, and Case C-409/06 Winner Wetera [2010] ECR I-8015, paragraph 61).

It is true that Article 53 of the Charter confirms that, where an EU legal act calls for national implementing measures, national authorities and courts remain free to apply national standards of protection of fundamental rights, provided that the level of protection provided for by the Charter, as interpreted by the Court, and the primacy, unity and effectiveness of EU law are not thereby compromised."25

In support of this position, the court points out that a Member State is not allowed to refuse to execute a European arrest warrant when the person concerned is in one of the situations mentioned in art.4(a)(1) of the Framework Decision.26 This provision was intended to solve the difficulties in the area of recognition of verdicts rendered in absentia, and effects:

"a harmonisation of the execution of a European arrest warrant in the event of a conviction rendered in absentia, which reflects the consensus reached by all the Member States regarding the scope to be given under EU law to the procedural rights enjoyed by persons convicted in absentia who are the subject of a European arrest warrant."27

The court then refers to the considerations of unity and effectiveness:

"Consequently, allowing a Member State to avail itself of Article 53 of the Charter to make the surrender of a person convicted in absentia conditional upon the conviction being open to review in the issuing Member State, a possibility not provided for under Framework Decision 2009/299, in order to avoid an adverse effect on the right to a fair trial and the rights of the defence guaranteed by the Constitution of the executing Member State, by casting doubt on the uniformity of the standard of protection of fundamental rights as defined in that framework decision, would undermine the principles of mutual trust and recognition which that decision purports to uphold and would, therefore, compromise the efficacy of that framework decision."28

The case at the Tribunal Constitutional

On February 13, 2014, the Tribunal Constitutional handed down its follow-up judgment in Melloni, which was published on March 11.29 In the third paragraph of the grounds of its judgment, the Tribunal notes that the answers of the Court of Justice are "very useful" (de gran utilidad), but nonetheless need to be supplemented with the doctrine laid down in the Tribunal's judgment in the Constitutional Treaty case of 2004.30 It reaffirms that the transfer of powers under the Spanish Constitution is subject to substantive limits, namely "respect of the sovereignty of the State, of our fundamental constitutional structures and of the system of fundamental principles and values consecrated in our Constitution, in which fundamental rights acquire their proper substance".31 It then rephrases, with reference to the 2004 judgment, that applying the primacy of EU law is based on the presupposition of respect for fundamental national constitutional structures, which includes fundamental rights.32 It recalls that it is not the Constitution but the Treaties that are the framework of validity for Union legislation, "although the Constitution requires that the legislation referred to as the result of the transfer be compatible with its basic values and principles. Moreover, of particular import in the context of art.53 of the Charter, it repeats that, notwithstanding all this, the Tribunal has held that, "In the unlikely case in which, in the ultimate development of European Union law, this law would prove to be incompatible with the Spanish Constitution, while the hypothetical infringement of European law [of primary European law] is not remedied by the ordinary channels provided [by that law], ultimately, the cornerstone of the sovereignty of the Spanish people and the supremacy of the Constitution which it has given itself could lead this Court to approach the problems which in such a case would arise, through the corresponding constitutional procedures, problems which under current circumstances are considered inadmissible."29

Next, the Tribunal recapitulates its doctrine on "indirect" infringements of the right to a fair trial under art.24 of the Spanish Constitution, as developed in its case law, but emphasises the importance of international human rights treaties, with which the constitutional value system coincides. The constitutional standard by which the order to surrender Mr Melloni needs to be judged includes, therefore, the human rights treaties to which Spain is a party, among which are the ECHR and Charter of Fundamental Rights as interpreted by the competent organs established by the relevant treaties, and these interpretations in turn are:

"essential elements to interpret the absolute content of the right recognized in Article 24(2) of the Spanish Constitution, the disregard of which would constitute an indirect infringement of the fundamental right by the Spanish authorities".30

After examining the case law of the ECHR (including more case law than the Court of Justice mentions in its judgment) and that of Court of Justice, the Tribunal concludes that these interpretations "coincide to a large extent" and can therefore provide it with the interpretative criteria to decide the case:

"Hence, we must now affirm, overruling the doctrine laid down in STC 91/2000, that a conviction in absentia does not involve an infringement of the absolute contents of the fundamental right to a fair trial, even if there is no remedy for the absent defendant, when this absence has been voluntarily and unambiguously decided by a defendant who was duly summoned, and has been effectively defended by an appointed Lawyer (Article 24.2 of the Spanish Constitution)."31

On this basis, the Tribunal rejects the appeal, considering that the Audiencia Nacional had established on the basis of an examination of the documents that legal counsel appointed by Melloni had not stopped representing him, while voluntarily waiving his right to be present at the hearings at all instances; hence, it had decided to surrender Melloni without infringing the requirements derived from the absolute content of this fundamental right under the Spanish Constitution.

This judgment of the Tribunal was accompanied by three concurring opinions, to which reference is made only briefly in the comments below.

Bases nacionales entre las que se encuentra los derechos fundamentales (en STC 1/2004, de 13 de diciembre, T 7).

29 The reference is to STC 1/2004, of December 13, §4.
31 TC Melloni, §26.

Commentary

The Melloni ruling of the Court of Justice is a landmark case on the status and rank of EU fundamental rights in relation to national constitutional rights, as well as on the primacy of EU law. As the former concerns the rights paradigm, and the latter the power paradigm, Melloni can provide insight into their relationship at the present state of European integration. This comment provides insight into their relationship at the present state of European integration. This comment provides insight into their relationship at the present state of European integration.

Fundamental rights and mutual recognition—of legislatures, executives, and courts

Mutual recognition sits uneasily with effective fundamental rights protection. The protection of fundamental rights is conceived of as not as something that should be realised by each of the authorities involved in recognising the acts of another authority, but by delegating that protection to the authority whose acts are recognised. Mutual recognition operates on the basis of a generalised sense of "mutual trust" that the other will take its task seriously, not that rights are actually protected in the concrete case, even if it concerns the general minimal standard espoused by the ECHR. This is evident in the Court of Justice’s case on the EAW, as demonstrated by the principle of mutual recognition does not allow for fundamental rights scrutiny in the concrete case (although some Advocates General have, to at least some extent, thought differently).32

This interpretation is repeated all the more forcefully in Melloni, where it concerned the application of a specific higher standard of protection: any invocation of fundamental rights protected at national level would undermine the objectives of secondary legislation—this is the starting point of the court in its answer to the first question—when secondary legislation (here, art.4(1) of the Framework Decision) proclaims its intention to harmonise the cases in which a restriction of a fundamental right is considered to be legitimate. In its answer to the second question, the court finds it sufficient that, totally in the abstract, the provision is in accordance with ECHR and Charter standards. Abstract conformity with European fundamental rights standards, either the minimum standard of the ECHR or the maximum standard of the Charter, prevents fundamental rights review in concrete cases under that legislative provision—such a review, the court seems to find, would undermine mutual recognition and the mutual trust on which it is based.33

As a matter of fact, attaching this importance to secondary legislation as "harmonisation of EU fundamental rights" risks erasing the difference between the primary law nature of fundamental rights and secondary law as subject to these rights. It also places considerable confidence in the legislature, perhaps too much so.

In this context, it somehow seems to be forgotten that, since the European Union entered the post-Lisbon era, the EAW Framework Decision and the amending decision, which is at the core of Melloni, are legislative only in substance. It was legislated upon by the Council, not the Parliament. It was a congregation of executives that acted authoritatively in this case. This amendng decision, moreover, was not on the initiative of the Commission but of fellow executives. This was the problem inherent in the very nature of decision-making under the Third 34 Opinion of Advocate General Mengoni in Execution of a European Arrest Warrant against Lopez de Sousa Jorge [C-67/07] [2012] 1 CMLR 54 at [28].

Pillar. With regard to executive acts, one might expect stronger judicial protection and closer judicial scrutiny than in the case of the products of legislatures with the direct democratic legitimacy of parliaments. In fact, the gradual extension of judicial protection in the course of the 20th century across Europe has generally been considered to be the natural consequence of the increased dominance of the executive. But what applies to national legal order across Europe may not apply to the European Union. Melloni, at least, does not seem to be inspired by the concerns of critically counterbalancing legislation that is made by an executive assembly only. Quite to the contrary: in Melloni, even executive-made EU law that is non-directly effective is, as I argue presently, granted primacy that had so far only been given to directly effective EU law.

Primacy

Primacy of non-directly effective EU law—setting aside primary EU law?

From Van Gend & Loos onwards, the doctrine of direct effect has been a judicial invention. There is only one exception to this: the text of the EU Treaty from Maastricht until Lisbon originally provided that framework decisions "shall not entail direct effect" [Art.54(2) E. Treaty (2001)]. However, after Lisbon, this qualification still applies to the primary Framework Decision (including the amending Framework Decision 2009/299) under the primary law of Protocol 36 to the Lisbon Treaty. Holding that non-directly effective EU law entails the duty to set aside national law is something of a revolution in EU law, and may amount to setting aside primary law. This deserves closer scrutiny.

There has been some controversy in the literature over how direct effect and primacy relate to each other. Apart from quasi-constitutional views of EU law as inherently superior to national law, there is a narrower and a broader notion of primacy. The narrower notion, in line with Costa v ENEL and the language of Sommatino v C [2006] is that primacy of EU law is essentially the duty to set aside national law in cases of conflict with EU law. The broader notion considers primacy not only as the duty to apply national law but also to the duty to apply national law consistently with EU law. The narrower notion of primacy would seem to be conditional on the relevant EU law being directly effective, whereas the broader notion might also apply to EU law that is not directly effective. From the perspective of the broader notion, saying that primacy applies under non-directly effective EU law is no big deal as long as there is no duty to set it aside and put it from the national legal order. Also in this view, a real novelty, if not a revolution, would reside in Melloni were it to entail that national law is to be set aside in favour of non-directly effective EU law. It is therefore important to establish whether that is really the case.

On its surface, Melloni does not seem to impose such a duty. The Court does not refer to Sommatino and it does not use its language of "setting aside" conflicting national law. Moreover, there is a curious treatment of "primacy, unity and effectiveness" when it comes to applying this tripartite formula to the case at hand. In fact, it seems that the court applies only two of the three essential character of EU law: unity and effectiveness. Article 62(3), the court explains that a reading of art.53 of the Charter that would allow the Spanish higher level of protection would "cast doubt on the uniformity of the application of supranational law", and "we cannot conceive of the framework decision as anything other than the direct application of the provisions of the Treaty at issue and as laying down rules of conduct binding the member states of the EU", and "the duty to set aside national law in case of conflict with EU law, as a result of art.54(2) E. Treaty, is not different from the duty to set aside national law in case of conflict with EU law, as a result of art.54(2) E. Treaty, in so far as it is not aimed at setting aside national law in cases of conflict with EU law. If this is not different from the duty to set aside national law in cases of conflict with EU law, as a result of art.54(2) E. Treaty, the Court is not dealing with an issue of primacy, but with an issue of the direct application of the provisions of the Treaty at issue and with the duty to set aside national law in case of conflict with EU law, as a result of art.54(2) E. Treaty."

The Charter’s authors had wanted to change such a prominent feature of Community law, which the Court of Justice has constantly affirmed over the years, they would have formulated it in clear terms; but even if they had wished to do so, the authors of the Charter did not have the legal authority to modify primary EU law.

Both of these arguments are not, in themselves, persuasive.

The Court of Justice may have affirmed and redefined the absolute primacy of EU law over the years, but it is equally clear that this has never been accepted in the same terms in most Member States. Nor can any rule more really or persuasively be written in the Luxembourg Convention of 2003 (at Art.47), that the Charter would not require constitutional amendments, apparently considering art.53 as a provision that prevented collisions between national constitutions and the Charter, but without specifying how. In short, the state of affairs as to the interpretation of art.53 was entirely open and left ambiguous, perhaps consciously. From the EU perspective, one was perhaps able to say primacy was not given up; from the national constitutional perspective, the prevailing national standard of protection was not given up either.

Another argument used for the view that primacy is not what art.53 is about, was that the text does not allow for a restriction of primacy from the EU perspective as it only says that "nothing in this Charter can restrict national constitutional protections, thus allowing for such a restriction".

---

118 FOCUS

European Current Law Issue 10 2014

1181 FOCUS

European Current Law Issue 10 2014
on the basis of either EU law, both primary and secondary, as interpreted by the court. This reflects the disadvantage that it brings to the protection of art.53 and overrules the importance of the Charter, at least since the Charter acquired primary status, which is to to consider secondary law by virtue of being superior to it. Secondary law, notwithstanding its national law, must simply be subject to the superior primary law of the Charter. In other words, owing to its superior rank under EU law, the Charter can necessarily qualify secondary law’s primacy, just as it can qualify its applicability and validity.

The fact is, of course, that Melloni sweeps aside any doubts that art.53 of the Charter might raise about primacy, whether they were intended or not. As in Winner Wetten,2 the court switches into a different mode when it thinks that primacy might be interfered with. Although in [CJEU], the court seems only to have an eye to “unity” (“uniformity”) and “effectiveness” (“efficacy”), it frames the totality of the argument in terms of primacy. Its answer to the question on art.53 immediately presents the conclusion that the interpretation suggested by the Spanish Constitutional Court “would undermine the principle of the primacy of EU law inasmuch as it would allow a Member State to disapply EU legal rules which are fully in compliance with the Charter where they infringe the fundamental rights guaranteed by that State’s constitution”26, it next states that it is “by virtue of the principle of primacy of EU law”27, that rules of national law, even of a constitutional order, cannot be allowed to undermine the effectiveness of (non-directly effective) EU law.

Moreover, Melloni not only holds to an absolute concept of primacy, it indeed entails the duty to set aside national constitutional law. Although the court does not refer to Simmenoth, it does refer to Winner Wetten, which, if anything, only reinforces the Sinnottian language (arguably quite unnecessarily). Instead of more ironic approaches such as those of Oms28 and Sign Wittgenstein,29 the ruling in Winner Wetten introduces the polemic term of “ousting effect”, which the court found to be entailed by both primacy and the duty of Union loyalty of Member States (in Winner Wetten, more specifically, the German Federal Constitutional Court). Winner Wetten may well be read as an act of open warfare,30 and Melloni may well be considered its continuation in a more overly constitutional context. Winner Wetten concerned the prospective overruling of Länder legislation on the basis of the general principle of legal certainty. Melloni concerns the core of a constitutional fundamental right in a particular Member State. In Winner Wetten, primacy is explicitly the primacy of directly effective secondary EU law, which has an “ousting effect” regarding national law, even if that “ousting” creates a legal void and legal uncertainty. Melloni is about non-directly effective EU law. Thus, the reference to Winner Wetten and [International Handtegengesellschaft] implies that this type of EU law also has the effect of setting aside national law, in the sense that the Spanish norm concerning the rights of the defence of a person convicted in absence must be disallowed, even if the court did not need to say this in so many words in Melloni.

Fields of application and “primacy, unity and effectiveness”

At first glance similar to art.53 ECHR and art.2 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which stipulate that the protection afforded by those international instruments cannot do away with the protection of fundamental rights provided at national level, art.53 of the Charter is dissimilar as regards the addition of the expression “in their respective fields of application”:

29 Oms (C-399/11) [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [58];
30 Melloni (C-399/11) [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [59];
31 Ibid. (C-399/11) [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [59];
32 Ibid. (C-399/11) [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [59];
33 [C-399/11] [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [59];
34 C-J (92) 2010, Directive, Recital 10, of the Data Protection Directive 95/46/EC. of 24 October 2000;Directive Directive on the right of access to personal data and on the right to rectify, complete, update, correct or delete inaccurate personal data and on the right to object to the processing of personal data relating to the data subject and full respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms, and in particular the right to privacy and to freedom of opinion and expression laid down in the ECHR.
35 C-J (92) 2004, of Directive 95/46/EC of 24 October 2000;Directive Directive on the right of access to personal data and on the right to rectify, complete, update, correct or delete inaccurate personal data and on the right to object to the processing of personal data relating to the data subject and full respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms, and in particular the right to privacy and to freedom of opinion and expression laid down in the ECHR.
36 C-J (118) 2004, of Directive 95/46/EC of 24 October 2000;Directive Directive on the right of access to personal data and on the right to rectify, complete, update, correct or delete inaccurate personal data and on the right to object to the processing of personal data relating to the data subject and full respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms, and in particular the right to privacy and to freedom of opinion and expression laid down in the ECHR.
37 C-J (118) 2004, of Directive 95/46/EC of 24 October 2000;Directive Directive on the right of access to personal data and on the right to rectify, complete, update, correct or delete inaccurate personal data and on the right to object to the processing of personal data relating to the data subject and full respect for the fundamental rights and freedoms, and in particular the right to privacy and to freedom of opinion and expression laid down in the ECHR.
manifestly contrary to public policy in the Member State in which recognition is sought. 48 The Court has held that the only reason that this is the case may be a conflict between the order as essential in the legal order of the State in which enforcement is sought or of a right recognised as being fundamental within that legal order. 49 This clearly sets a limit to the mutual recognition of court decisions. In Strock, 50 the Court allowed in an abstract judgment of 6 May 2013 at 20. The Spanish Constitutional Court's case law on constitutional law verdicts in absentia to apply to judgments in default to private law, this would be without any problem whatsoever. Private law "public policy" is paradoxically a stronger ground for exceptions to mutual recognition than public law "public policy".

The "primacy, unity and effectiveness" exception to fundamental rights applies only when a piece of EU law is at stake that applies or should apply uniformly throughout the European Union. This leads us to reflect on the threshold expression "primacy, unity and effectiveness", which is contained in Meloni and has barely been used before, 51 and has the potential to become a magic formula. 52 The novelty of the formula here resides in the element of "unity" in combination with primacy and effectiveness—a renunciation of the more classic expressions "uniformity" or "uniform effect".

Semantically, the difference might be significant, since "the unity of EU law is not immediately at stake if there is no "uniformity". 53 The best example of this may be in the field of public interest exceptions to the free movement provisions, as found in Orga, where the court held that uniformity in the protection of fundamental rights that restrict free movement is not required. 54 This is not, however, cause for optimism about the constitutional diversity which the court allows in the Union, by speaking of "unity" rather than "uniformity"; one swallow does not make a summer.

First, the court itself, within two paragraphs, switches back from the "unity of EU law at [60] to the "uniformity" of EU law at [63]—which is the language of 1970 (Internationale Handelsgeellschaft). Secondly, in contrast to that of the economic free movement rights, the context of secondly, the differentiation between whether the relevant legal provision is different under EU law is established, and that the court faces the face: no cases covered by the letter of art.4(1) of the Framework Decision could ever be an infringement of a fundamental right. This uncritical acceptance of 49 Trade Agency [C-169/10] September 6, 2012 at [51].

50 A digital full-text search in English in the publicly accessible case law of the ECJ on "primary unity and effectiveness" leads to the result that it was not used in this particular combination prior to Meloni, and that it has never been used in Singapore (C-299/13 March 16, 2014 at [31]); the expression "unity and effectiveness" at [4] the Community law or Union law was used in Commission v.info [C-181/05] [2007] ECR I-259, 259 at [11]; Melloni [C-550/07] [2009] ECR I-256 at [15]; to the General Court, it was in the context of judgment C-230/07 [2009] ECR I-259 the "unity of European Union law was used at Aris, Nobel Chemicals and Astra Chemicals v. Commission [C-550/07] [2009] ECR I-256 at [15] and CCMLR 19 at [15] in the context of the common market law. 51 On the semantics of the primacy law: see e.g. J, Faúl, "Case-Case-law-Law—Ratifications in an Illustration of how the Court of Justice of the European Union Constructs Its Legal Argument" (2013) 9 European Constitutional Law Review 20. 52 This would be analogous to the distinction made by A.G. Kokott in her Opinion in Struck (C-57/12) [2013] 519 at 13, 15 and 25 in 129, based on the concept of the "unity and consistency" of EU law as a general legal order (under art.256 TFUE) (it must be found that the unity of Union law is manifestly harmonised within a particular sphere or group of EU law which may be fundamental, whereas the consistency of Community law is manifestly harmonised in a particular area, whereas the General Court has reversed an existing case law of the European Union Court.
53 See Orga [C-26/02] [2004] ECR I-1609.

The EU Treaty imposes the duty to respect the constitutional identities of Member States inherent in their constitutional and political structures (art.4(1) TEU). Legally, this expresses the plurality of political orders and of their underlying core values: unity in diversity. The notion of respect for constitutional identity regards as essential constitutional values that are common to Member States, but also those which are particular to one or several Member States only. It is not only the constitutional traditions common to the Member States that are protected, but also pluralism of values. The very fact this pluralism that core values and their meanings are contestable. To give an example: whether the form of a state is a constitutional monarchy or a republic may be a question touching on a Member State's identity. Whether the republican form of the state entails a prohibition of noble names and titles is not necessarily identical in all republics, nor generally accepted within a particular republic? And yet, under EU law, this issue is rightly considered to pertain to the constitutional identity of the state. 72 The Meloni case highlights an element of institutional differentiation that is immediately related to the inherent contestability of substantive values that inheres in pluralism of values. The Spanish Constitutional Court's interpretation of the rights of defence with regard to trials in absentia, as involving human dignity in cases of so-called indirect infringements, was a judicial interpretation that was not shared by the Spanish Government when it adopted the relevant provision of the Framework Decision in the Council, nor was it shared by all other Spanish courts. In decision-making on the EAW, the Spanish Government pursued a different interest from that which was served by the Constitutional Court; it is the difference between waging the fight against terror and crime versus the protection of individual rights in that fight. The salience of this is that when the Spanish Government voted in favour of the 2009 Framework Decision, it acted in violation of the Spanish Constitution an understood in standing case law of the Spanish Constitutional Court. 73 One may that it attempted to amend Spanish constitutional law via the Brussels route.

The Court of Justice sanctioned that approach in Meloni. In terms of rights protection, one can criticise this as including too much to the crime-fighters' perspective—though Stefanos Meloni was neither a terrorist nor involved in organised crime—and too little to the rights of citizens, 74 as an inaction that is evident in much of the Court of Justice's EAW case law. From the institutional perspective, it becomes evident that the Court of Justice arbitrated, willfully, on a constitutional disagreement between the Spanish Government and the Spanish Constitutional Court in favour of the former.

This touches on another point that was discussed in the Opinion of the Advocate General in Meloni. It concerned a matter that the court left aside in its judgment, the question whether the rights of defence under the Spanish Constitution are part of the constitutional identity. The Advocate General comes to the conclusion that they are not (at [137]-[145] of the Opinion). To that effect, he states:

"Apart from the fact that the determination of what constitutes the 'essence' of the right to defend oneself remains contested in the Tribunal Constitutional, the Kingdom of Spain, the hearing, relying inter alia on the exceptions in Spanish law to the holding of a retrial following a judgment rendered in absentia, that the participation of the defendant at his trial is not covered by the concept of the national identity of the Kingdom of Spain." 11

This is a rather unconvinced approach on both counts.

The fact that the core of a right is contested clearly does not imply that there is no such core, as explained above. A superficial glance at the relevant Spanish constitutional case law places it beyond doubt that the relevant constitutional right at stake did not concern the finer points of the right or its outer margins, but its very core only. In the terminology of the Spanish Constitutional Court, its violation affects "human dignity"—a legal concept that was reason for the Court of Justice in Ómega to accept the differentiated effect of the free movement of services in different Member States. The importance of the core right was not picked up by the Court of Justice: a symptom of Melloni as a dialogue among the deaf?

Holding subsequently that it was "the Kingdom of Spain itself" that had stated that rights of the defence in a trial in absentia do not belong to the national identity of Spain is rather naive. It was the government speaking, not the Member State—the same government that had violated its Constitution (as it was then interpreted) when agreeing to the Framework Decision. The situation was similar to that faced by the Court of Justice in Landtová,26 where the Czech Government had a fundamental—and outspoken—constitutional conflict with the Czech Constitutional Court.27 One would expect the Court of Justice to be alert to such problems. Perhaps the court avoided getting into the quagmire of arbitrating between national constitutional institutions by avoiding the issue of constitutional identity altogether—but it had got itself into it already by total deference to the Council's (ie, the Member State government) intentions with the 2009 Framework Decision. Indeed, the Council in its (in case exclusive) legislative act made an important task to respect national constitutional identities. This could possibly legitimate defiance by the court towards the legislature. However, when the Council cannot do so because one of its members chooses to act in conflict with a constitutional obligation, resulting in a failure for the European Union to respect its obligation under art 4(2) TEE, such deference is problematic.

A different way to look at the court's silence on the issue of constitutional identity is that this may still be an option out of future constitutional conflict in the context of art 53 of the Charter.28 This would lead to a quite different understanding of primacy: although EU primacy is the "normal" case of a conflict between a national and an EU fundamental rights standard, this would suffer an exception if the national standard pertained to constitutional identity of a Member State; and this escape route of constitutional identity is left open in Melloni.29 Perhaps this, too, is what art 4(2) TEE, or art 53 of the Charter only applies to the uncontroversial case of Member State discretion, but the higher national standard can only apply when national constitutional identity is at stake. In this last case, it is not art 53 of the 11 Opinion of A.G. Bot in Melloni ([C-399/11]) [2013] 2 CMLR 43 at [146] (emphasis added)

13 For the "Maximum Standard" in Alessandra Silveira ([2013] 21 NJW 2071), see also Besselink, "Anarchic Law and also articulated by the Italian Constitutional Court in Fruggeri, the language of which is echoed in the Spanish Constitutional Court in Melloni. And, clearly, there is no equivalence whatsoever between the Spanish constitutional case law as it stood before Melloni and the European Arrest Warrant as interpreted by the Court of Justice.
14 The judicial dialogue
The Court of Justice's Melloni judgment has been received critically in the literature, in particular as regards the quality of the court's reasoning, which has been characterised by one German scholar with epithets such as "a too global analysis," "astonishing," "again an inadequate approach of the problem," "unsound," "half-hearted" 30 on the quality of the judicial dialogue in the part of the Court of Justice, a Spanish scholar cautiously remarked that "the institutional empanth shown by the court is equivalent to that of a potato";31 he remarked on "the striking absence" of a balanced assessment of the arguments put forward by the referring court, which is "a prerequisite of legal empathy": "If there is any clear manifestation of deadness or the Asperger syndrome of the Court of Justice, it is this."32 However, the reproach of a refusal to engage in a serious dialogue was made to the Spanish Constitutional Court too, notably in the concurring opinion of Judge Encarnación Roca Trías in the follow-up judgment, in which she complained that the majority failed to engage in "an effective and not merely apparent judicial dialogue."

The series of judicial utterances in Melloni ended with the Spanish Constitutional Court generally lowering the standard of protection previously provided by art 24 of the Spanish Constitution, both in cases of surrender within the European Union and in cases of extradition to any other non-EU state.33 The Constitutional Court found a basis for doing so in an Spanish provision of the Constitutional Constitution, which provides that:

"The norms concerning fundamental rights and liberties recognized by the Constitution shall be interpreted in conformity with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms."

This provision—art.12(1) of the Constitution—also takes on board EU law whenever that is relevant to the Spanish legal order. As the Court of Justice acknowledged in its considerations of the admissibility issue, it is precisely in the autonomous interpretation by the Spanish Constitutional Court of the meaning of the Spanish Constitution's provisions relevant to the Mellow case that the Court of Justice's interpretation of the Charter and the RAW Framework Decision comes in; that is to say, within the autonomous interpretation by the Constitutional Court of national constitutional law.

This setting can also explain why the Constitutional Court found it legitimate to "supplement" its interpretation of the Constitution with its remarks about the prevalence of the Spanish Constitution in cases where EU law would conflict with it. For all intents and purposes, this means that if EU law conflicts with the fundamental rights standard of the Spanish Constitution, and this conflict cannot be solved otherwise, the latter will prevail. In sum, the interpretation of art.5.1 of the Charter by the Court of Justice in Mellow will not, if it really came to it, be followed by the Constitutional Court. That this is not a fanciful interpretation of the Constitutional Court's final judgment in Mellow is witnessed by the concurring opinion of Justice Encarnación Roca Trías, which criticizes the majority precisely for making this interpretation at least possible if not the only one intended. For her, the dialogue would have been successful if the Constitutional Court had simply accepted and followed the line of reasoning of the Court of Justice, even though that would seem to be the one-way traffic of "obedience" rather than a plurilateral "dialogue."48

The degree of principled judicial disobedience compensates for the judicial obedience and compliance in lowering the protection provided by what allegedly was the core of a constitutional right. A more "dialectical" element in the Constitutional Court's judgment inheres in its statement that "in the unlikely case of a hypothetical infringement by EU law of the Spanish Constitution which 'is not remedied by the ordinary channels provided [by EU law],' the Constitutional Court would have to respect the principle of popular sovereignty and its expression in the Spanish Constitution. This is another way of saying: 'Court of Justice, be sensitive and responsive to the implication of values of national constitutions!' Evidently, the Constitutional Court found that the Court of Justice's judgment in Mellow necessitated the making of such a remark. The particular dynamics of the "dialogue" in Mellow may, on the part of the Court of Justice, perhaps be understood in the absence of clear Strasbourg case law concerning mutual recognition in the context of trial in absentia that would have given support to the point of the earlier Spanish constitutional case law. Under such circumstances, the court was ready for a conflict with an embedded constitutional court like the Spanish, which is pretty much in competition with ordinary Spanish courts. That the Court of Justice is not likely to do the same with more powerful constitutional courts, like the Bundesverfassungsgericht, is shown by its cases on data protection,49 a legal field that the German Federal Constitutional Court has declared to concern its constitutional identity at an early stage in its data retention judgment.5

Conclusion

The Precaution to the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights states that the Union "places the individual at the heart of its activities". That is not apparent from the Court of Justice's judgment in Mellow. The court was evidently less concerned with protecting the fundamental rights of individuals granted by primary law than with safeguarding the intentions of the legislators, notably governments, when they made secondary legislation.

In a sheer concern for the primacy of secondary law, even though it was not directly effective, led to a mode of judging which is more like that of making a statement than that of careful consideration of various arguments. As the court's later judgment in Sysong makes plain in an obiter dictum, citing Melloni as authority, the objective of fundamental rights protection is not the concern for the rights of the individual but, "the need to avoid a situation in which the level of protection of fundamental rights varies according to the national law involved in such a way as to undermine the unity, primacy and effectiveness of EU law."50

So the Precaution to the Charter was wrong; it is not rights themselves that are important, primary law is the real issue. Fifty years after Costa v Ebel, the court settles for absolute primacy as a greater concern than substantive rights. It is not the citizen and his rights that move the court; it is the primacy of EU law over national law, even non-directive effective EU secondary law over national constitutional law.

On the more specific legal context of art.53 of the Charter, we in the meantime have to wonder what Melloni has brought. Although it has been suggested that the main purpose of this provision was that "existing regimes should not be applied and interpreted 'downwards' by invoking the language of the Charter",51 this is precisely what the interpretation of art.53 of the Charter in Melloni effected: the interpretation "downwards" of the rights of the defendant under the Spanish Constitution by the Spanish Constitutional Court, which considered itself forced to do so under the influence of the Court of Justice's interpretation of the rights of defence under the Charter. For the moment, this has avoided overt constitutional conflict, but new material for an outbreak of such conflict is provided by the Court of Justice in Melloni itself.

Might there still be a way out? I agree with some commentators that the issue of constitutional identity provides one way out, although there are clear objections as to the manner in which this was (or rather: was not) handled in Melloni. Instead of the language of some 40 or 50 years ago, when EU law still needed to establish itself in the Member State legal orders, the court would at any rate have to revert to the different, more mature, subtle, balanced and nuanced ways of Omega and Som-Müller—however, the chances of its doing so seem somehow reduced after Melloni.

In terms of the general constitutional situation in Europe, we may understand this state of affairs in terms of shifts within constitutional paradigms. The paradigm of rights prevailing in post-war Western European states, and in Middle and Eastern European Member States since the fall of the Berlin Wall, is in the context of European integration shaped by the paradigm that dominated the "long 17th century" of European constitutionalism, that of power allocation: the assertion of primacy is the main concern of the Court of Justice not only in the age of the early establishment of EU law (the 1960s and 1970s) but even in the 21st century. This may explain the strongly doctrinaires reflex in Melloni that fits into a line of more or less recent cases like Winnem Wall, of the polemic tone contrasts with the more ironic, accommodating and conciliatory approach of Omega and Som-Müller. It may also be an indication that the constitutional paradigm of the 21st century will unavoidably be that of neither rights nor powers in the exclusive terms it had in the 19th century, but that of relations between constitutional orders.

---

48 Spanish Constitution art.10(2).
49 Cf. recent concurrence of Benchma constitutional Court in Favor (Case No 249/19) 1 April 1998.
50 Most recently, Digital Rights Ireland v Minister for Communications, Marine and Natural Resources (C-293/12 and C-594/12) April 4, 2013.

FOCUS

Human Rights and with international treaties and agreements on the same matter ratified by Spain.56

1188 European Current Law Issue 10 2014

1189 European Current Law Issue 10 2014