Family ambiguity and domestic violence in Asia: Reconceptualising law and process

Mohamad, M.; Wieringa, S.

Published in:
IIAS Newsletter

Citation for published version (APA):
Family ambiguity and domestic violence in Asia: Reconceptualising law and process

The book Family Ambiguity and Domestic Violence in Asia (2013; Brighton: Sussex University Press) raises pertinent questions as to why the incidence of domestic violence has remained as a continuing scourge. The Focus section in this issue of The Newsletter provides the abridged version of select articles within the book. Seven scholars examine comparative experiences in the Asian context in order to gauge the effectiveness of family regulations and laws in diverse national, cultural and religious setting. Although the issue of violence against women (VAW) has received much attention from scholars, social activists, policy makers and international agencies, violence in the home has persisted. Though a universal phenomenon, VAW is also context specific. As domestic violence (DV) per definition takes place within a family setting, the specific forms of families and their supporting ideologies greatly affect the specificities of DV in particular contexts. Comparative cultural and national responses to the issue have shown that the ambiguity of family underscores some of the gaps between the conceptual, legal and process-oriented solutions to the eradication of VAW in society.

Maznah Mohamad and Saskia Wieringa

Image reproduced here and on the following page under a creative commons license, courtesy of Jim Boud on flickr. Image used solely to illustrate article. No implied meaning is attached to the actual event portrayed.
The culture defence discourse and the right to family and privacy, act to seal the family as an isolated and autonomous unit. A human rights perspective is needed to re-situate the family within the justice system.

Violence against women is reinforced by the state conception of family as a private domain, as well as the notion of the harmonious family being the foundation of the nation. Male authority over the family and the women in it is further imposed as a religious norm.

The newsletter under the rubric ‘concept’ capture some of the more salient debates surrounding the issue of domestic violence. There are conceptual issues that are still not reconciled or continue to be disputed, yet contribute towards how advocacy, law, policy and cultural norms are being shaped.

Concept

Articles under the rubric ‘concept’ capture some of the more salient debates surrounding the issue of domestic violence. There are conceptual issues that are still not reconciled or continue to be disputed, yet contribute towards how advocacy, law, policy and cultural norms are being shaped.

Culture-as-defence

One of the more prevalent defences of why violence happens in the home is that certain cultural and religious doctrines allow for its use, and that by using it, the boundaries of cultural and religious distinctiveness are defended. Hence, domestic violence can be viewed as being a culture in and of itself, explains Aziz in her article. But she cautions that culture merely represents a socio-political symbolic discourse, which changes over time. By analysing several international cases of domestic violence, Aziz excavates how and why domestic violence continues to be erroneously placed within culture and why the intersecting issues of privacy, culture and honour with violence have gotten in the way of granting justice to victims of domestic violence.

The culture discourse and the right to family and privacy, act to seal the family as an isolated and autonomous unit. A human rights perspective is needed to re-situate the family within the justice system. In this, state action and inaction sometimes work against this as they tolerate, if not encourage, domestic violence.

DV: Neutral or gender-based?

Another conceptual paradigm that has muddied the debate on domestic violence is the question of whether domestic violence should be seen as a neutral wrong rather than one that is specific to gender discrimination. The profound ambiguities that these debates reflect are relevant to the Asian context. It shows how universal the idea of family and its link to the perceived dichotomy between private and public has become. As our Asian case studies illuminate, at one level there is successful mainstreaming of the domestic violence issue implying feminist collaboration with institutions such as social work, healthcare or the criminal justice system. However, these are not necessarily in tune with the feminist position on domestic violence, as a form of violent discrimination against women.

The other dilemma is that while the human rights approach has succeeded in eliciting a state response to domestic violence, criminalisation must also include preventive and protective support measures. However, there is still scant recognition that violence is intrinsically related to gendered inequality between men and women, a conceptual flaw that would need to be addressed all over the world.
Family as state construction

In exploring the breadth and depth of domestic violence, the family as social construction forms part of the intriguing puzzle. Just as state prerogatives have shifted, so has the image of the family. Nandy traces the trajectory of family regulation via-a-via domestic violence in India, where there have been major shifts in legislation and its discourse.

Outlining ancient Indian family’s attempts at self-regulation, to modern state-based regulation, Nandy’s contribution makes note of different forces that have buttressed the notion of family privacy and sanctity all along. She argues that rights to conjugality have always superseded that of the individual’s.

In locating family as a state construction, Ganapathy analyses the tenor of state paternalism when the proposed Bill on Family Violence was rejected after 30 days of parliamentary debates in Singapore. The grounds for this was that it would be detrimental to the family. The bill was said to be at odds with the state’s defined role of the family, considered the “fundamental building block out of which larger social structures can be stably constructed”. Popular sentiment has it that criminalisation is neither an appropriate nor an effective method to deal with abusers against their own family and that social service agencies are preferred over police intervention.

Provisions in the 1987 Philippine Constitution define Filipino sexuality, and shape Filipino’s ‘consciousness of what is acceptable and unacceptable, what is normal, and what is deviant or perverse’, as Alipio argues. Marriage, the family and the nation are interlinked. The Constitution “recognises the Filipino family as the foundation of the nation” and therefore the state will actively promote its development. Additionally, The Family Code of 1988 explicitly proclaims that parental authority over the person, property and children is given to the father/husband, whose decision shall be paramount over the mother/wife. Thus, the belief that the husband has absolute authority over his wife and children, and the impossibility of divorce, enhances the belief that the man can do no wrong. Alipio’s study finds that for women their bodies have become their voice, by going abroad. This is seen as a silent but appropriate strategy to leave abusive relationships, especially since divorce is illegal in Catholic Philippines.

Katjaaugaama similarly discusses the pervasiveness of violence against women that is being reinforced by the state conceptualization of family as a private matter, as well as the notion of the harmonious family being the foundation of the nation. Male authority over the family and the women it is in it further imposed the violence norm.

In Malaysia no ‘family code’ is explicitly worded, as there is in the Philippine and Indonesian cases. Hence, the family debate is largely captured under the rubric of Islam as analysed in Mohamad’s article. Due to the dominance of Islam in governance and the extending of provisions within Sharia law for Muslims, the Domestic Violence Bill was initially rejected by the Islamic faction. In Malaysia it is also through Islam has become the de facto representative of all patriarchal forces, and assumes its role as the main builder and gatekeeper of the essential ‘moral’ family.

Heteronormativity as violence

Another crucial set of concepts explored here is hetero-normativity and passionate aesthetics, and its link to violence in the family. Wieringa argues that in maintaining the internal cohesion of heteronormativity, violence is exerted in the physical and symbolic sense. Her research on widows, sex workers and prostitutes suggests that there is enormous violence involved in the perpetuation of the myth of heteronormativity as creating or preserving the harmonious Asian family.

Wieringa explicates the meaning of aesthetics in situating violence within heteronormativity. It is a concept referring to a set of principles that underlie the making of morality. Heteronormativity as a system of values is subjective, while at the same time considered to have universal relevance. Any aesthetic distinction is based on subjective views, yet acquires a hegemonic power in a given context. Violence, as explored in Wieringa’s article is intrinsic to passionate aesthetics that underlie heteronormativity. Even when mental and sexual violence occurs the ideal of the harmonious heterosexual family remains intact. Women internalise their shame and guilt rather than blame the perpetrators. Hence, they attest to the power of the symbolic violence of heteronormativity.

Law

Besides ‘concepts’, the articles also centre their analyses of domestic violence in Asia around the issue of ‘law’. They touch on the role of law in bringing the issue of domestic violence into the public realm. It was in Malaysia that the first legislation on domestic violence was passed in Asia. The Malaysian Domestic Violence Act (DVA) was first passed in Parliament in 1994, but it took two years for it to be implemented. The two years that the law was held in limbo was due to pressure from various quarters, significantly the Islamic faction, which did not want Islamic family matters to be governed by what was perceived as a civil and therefore ‘sectarian’ law. Mohamad’s article argues that in the Malaysian case the state tried to be responsive to both feminists as well as the Islamic factions, resulting in a law that was ‘diluted’, and making it difficult to charge the violence to be charged either as a criminal offence or a civil wrong.

In Singapore, the first legislative change dealing with domestic violence came about in 1997 when the Amendments to the Women’s Charter (Chapter 353) were made to provide protection for family members. Most cases of domestic violence are set aside of the criminalisation process, due to the absence of support structures for ‘victims’ if criminalisation proceeds as the course of action. The paternalistic and patriarchal state also impedes women’s empowerment by preserving the limits of police intervention in domestic violence. In a patriarchal discourse, protection is predominant over empowerment or equal treatment.

In the Philippines, despite the enactment in 2004 of Republic Act 9262 (The Anti-Violence Against Women and Their Children (VAWC) Act), there is a persistent fallacy of the harmonious Asian family.

Below: Illustration taken from an Indian poster about violence against women and how to seek assistance. Image reproduced under a creative commons courtesy of the ‘Centre for Women’s Global Leadership’ (CWGL) on flickr.

But the process of making domestic violence a named subjectivity is not just the preserve of civil society.

Ganapathy’s study reveals the role of women lawyers and the support provided by the police in the recognition or concealment of domestic violence as a punishable offence. In his study, police response to domestic violence is largely competent and effective, but the nature of women’s rights does not end with the enactment of a law. It needs to be followed through with implementation.

Besides the problems of implementation experienced similarly elsewhere, there is in several national laws that are in conflict with the stipulations within the DVA. This constitutes one of the biggest structural barriers to the successful implementation of the DVA. The laws include the 1974 Marriage Law, the 1991 KKH and the Labour Law. Another problem is Indonesia’s system of Legal Pluralism, which is a legacy of Dutch colonialism. Additionally there is the dichotomy between traditional and court jurisdiction. Domestic violence straddles both. Regional particularity such as the comprehensive implementation of Sharia in the provinces of Aceh is of the difficulty of enforcing law that is based on the principle of gender rights as human rights.

Poor conviction rates in domestic violence cases and unwieldy court procedures have made legal remedies less useful for women. Hence, the passage of India’s domestic violence law, the Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act (DVDAW), did not radically transform the notion that family privacy is sacrosanct. Many surveys in India, as discussed in Nandy’s article, underscore the perception that “domestic violence is a family affair”. The privacy of family will continue to sustain gendered hierarchies that are often dependent on the deployment of male domination and violence. In such a situation law “becomes a site of ambiguity instead of a force against it”.

The ambiguous status of the law, being both civil and criminal, has been a source of concern. Mohamad’s study shows that gender violence, even if defined within the ambit of the Malaysian Penal Code, will not be sufficiently addressed by law and is a consequence of the nature of ‘hurt’ and ‘harm’ inflicted by intimate partners on each other.

Process

A third crucial layer, after concept and law, is the process itself – how actors are able to engage in a political context to get domestic violence on the agenda of national and global deliberations and interventions. In Mohamad’s article the Malaysian DVA was one of the most outstanding examples of law-making from below, involving the participation of a spectrum of interest groups.

The campaign and social movement behind the establishment of the DVA in Indonesia is another significant social process evolving rights consciousness on gender-based violence. Katjaaugaama documents how NGOs like DMB-APK and Rifka Anisa collaborated with state agencies, such as the Gender Unit of the Ministry of Religious Affairs and the Indonesian National Commission on Women, to push for a law that would protect women from domestic violence. The law was finally enacted on 14 September 2004, and became effective on 22 September 2004, during the term of President Megawati Soekarnoputri.

The above triangulation of civil society, politicians and bureaucrats finds similar resonance in the Malaysian domestic violence movement. The campaign for a DVA in Malaysia started as early as 1985, although the law was only passed in 1994 and enforced in 1996. Like the Indonesian case, the drafting of the bill was an inclusive process that engaged many different representatives of civil society and government, including the opposition parties.

But the process of making domestic violence a named subjectivity is not just the preserve of civil society.

Ganapathy’s study reveals that the participation of women lawyers and the support provided by the police in the recognition or concealment of domestic violence as a punishable offence. In his study, police response to domestic violence is largely competent and effective, but the nature of women’s rights does not end with the enactment of a law. It needs to be followed through with implementation.

Rethinking the Asian family

Violence against women is a global phenomenon, rooted in the unequal balance of power between women and men, in which women suffer severe forms of physical, emotional, sexual and economic harm. This article seeks to reflect on this recognition. The anti-women’s backlash spurred by the family violence approach may lead to the continuation of practices that put women’s safety in jeopardy. The violence that women experience is largely concealed and undermined by states that seek to conceal it and discourage its recognition. The anti-women’s backlash spurred by the family violence approach may lead to the continuation of practices that put women’s safety in jeopardy.

Sexual literacy, legal awareness among women and gender awareness among law enforcers must be given special attention, as should education for girls and a ban on early marriages. As domestic violence takes place in the home and is often justified by patriarchal biases that stipulate that women should be submissive, dependent and under the control of the domestic violence model, is that family violence. The model, in turn, is often dependent on the deployment of male domination and violence. In such a situation law “becomes a site of ambiguity instead of a force against it”.

The ambiguous status of the law, being both civil and criminal, has been a source of concern. Mohamad’s study shows that gender violence, even if defined within the ambit of the Malaysian Penal Code, will not be sufficiently addressed by law and is a consequence of the nature of ‘hurt’ and ‘harm’ inflicted by intimate partners on each other.

The above triangulation of civil society, politicians and bureaucrats finds similar resonance in the Malaysian domestic violence movement. The campaign for a DVA in Malaysia started as early as 1985, although the law was only passed in 1994 and enforced in 1996. Like the Indonesian case, the drafting of the bill was an inclusive process that engaged many different representatives of civil society and government, including the opposition parties.

But the process of making domestic violence a named subjectivity is not just the preserve of civil society.

Ganapathy’s study reveals that the participation of women lawyers and the support provided by the police in the recognition or concealment of domestic violence as a punishable offence. In his study, police response to domestic violence is largely competent and effective, but the nature of women’s rights does not end with the enactment of a law. It needs to be followed through with implementation.