African asylum seekers in Israel
between Jewish historic obligation and political Zionist militancy Kalir, B.

Publication date
2014

Document Version
Final published version

Published in Dialogue - Politics Society

Citation for published version (APA):
http://issuu.com/kclpolitics/docs/dialogue08/1

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: https://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.

UvA-DARE is a service provided by the library of the University of Amsterdam (https://dare.uva.nl)
Dialogue | Middle East

African Asylum Seekers in Israel: Between Jewish Historic Obligation and Political Zionist Militancy

By Barak Kalir

Since 2005, an estimated 60,000 asylum seekers from sub-Saharan Africa, mostly from Eritrea and Sudan, have entered Israel by crossing the border from Egypt. Escaping their countries, they arrived in Israel after a lengthy journey by foot, mostly operated by smuggling networks of Bedouins. Although paying their smugglers thousands of dollars, many African asylum seekers en route to Israel have been raped, tortured into sex slaves, kidnapped for ransom, or even killed for the purposes of trading their organs.

In Israel, the presence of African asylum seekers has become a major political issue in recent years. Although a majority of the 1951 UN Refugee Convention and its 1967 Optional Protocol, Israel systematically refuses to grant a refugee status to African asylum seekers. In fact, the Israeli government has been doing its utmost to reject the claims of asylum seekers under the pretext of them being economic migrants. At the same time, in January 2013, Israel completed a multi-million dollar project of building a border fence, costing the state of African asylum seekers.

Since the completion of the fence, the number of asylum seekers who manage to cross the border has plummeted from a few thousand per month to less than a hundred in the entire year of 2013.

As for those who managed to enter Israel, the government has vowed - as was formally stated by the former Interior Minister, Eliahu Yishai - to "make their lives miserable until they leave, and return to where they came from." In official Israeli terminology, African asylum seekers are referred to as "infiltrators." This term originated in the 1980s when armed Palestinian groups infiltrated Israel from Egypt and Jordan to attack different targets. Palestinian infiltrators were criminalized and faced up to five years in prison for reentering the border. The term "infiltrators" thus carries a highly negative meaning that is linked to the Israeli mindset on national security and terrorism, and thus defines an entire population of asylum seekers.

The Israeli institutional discrimination to reject the claims of African asylum seekers is clearly reflected in the work of the Refugee Status Determination unit. The unit was inaugurated in 2009 and in the following three years, processed around 14,000 asylum applications, granting a refugee status to a mere 22 applicants. This tiny approval rate is the lowest among Western countries. Of importance here is that for years Israel has specifically prevented individuals from Eritrea and Sudan from submitting their asylum application. Instead, reiterating the discrimination in these countries, Israel provides "temporary group protection" to all Eritreans and Sudanese and applies the principle of non-refoulement. However, by imposing its "temporary group protection" on Eritreans and Sudanese, who comprise around 90 percent of the total population of asylum seekers in Israel, the government evades the very real eventualities of awarding many of them a refugee status. Notably, under the Israeli "temporary group protection," asylum seekers are not given basic economic and social rights; they do not receive work permits, health insurance, social benefits, or any provisions for shelter and food.

As a direct result of the Israeli policy, many asylum seekers end up living in extreme poverty, often sleeping in public parks in south Tel Aviv, one of the poorest urban areas in the country. Without basic state provisions, asylum seekers become highly dependent on the aid they receive from concerned Israeli NGOs. Different NGOs provide asylum seekers medical care, legal assistance, food and clothes, social care, linguistic training, shelter and many more services that the state fails to secure for them.

Since 2012, the antagonistic Israeli treatment of asylum seekers has reached new heights. Formally, the government passed the "Prevention of Infiltration Law" that allows for the administrative detention of up to three years for those who cross the border from Egypt. Publicly, several politicians have unleashed a veritable rhetorical attack against asylum seekers, referring to them as criminals, health hazards, security risks and, in the words of one MP from the ruling Likud party, Mini Regev, as "a cancer in our body."

This hostile approach has set the stage for an increasing number of violent and racist incidents in which Israeli citizens beat up African asylum seekers on the street, throw bricks into shops and homes that are associated with asylum seekers, and at one point, even set fire with Molotov bottles on an asylum seeker's boat in South Tel Aviv that was functioning as a refuge for asylum seekers' children.

Civil society actors have been relentlessly trying to challenge the antagonistic Israeli treatment of asylum seekers. NGOs, together with some academic scholars and private lawyers, carry the flag when it comes to fighting for an Israeli asylum policy that is in line with human rights standards and international conventions. For example, in 2013 several asylum seekers appealed to the Israeli High Court against the legality of the "Prevention of Infiltration Law" which was then revoked by the court on grounds of non-constitutionality and in violation of Israel's Basic Law: Human Dignity and Freedom. In addition, NGOs have been mobilizing a public campaign for raising awareness on the dramatic situation of asylum seekers through street demonstrations, newspaper articles, cultural events and public debates.

“(…) several politicians have unleashed a veritable rhetorical attack against asylum seekers, referring to them as criminals, health hazards, security risks and, in the words of one MP from the ruling Likud party, Mini Regev, as ‘a cancer in our body.’”

The most striking recent event in Israel is over the rights of asylum seekers and the way in which the Jewishness of the Israeli state has been used for warring both against stands. In an attempt to generate humanitarian compassion among politicians and to mobilize public opinion, Israeli civil society actors regularly evoke the Jewish history of persecution and the Holocaust in particular, as endowing Israel the universal moral obligation to combat all forms of ethnic and religious persecution ("Never Again"). At the same time, many Israeli politicians repeatedly rehash the Zionist/backward narrative that claims, in the absence of legal assistance, food and clothes, social care, linguistic training, shelter and many more services that the state fails to secure for them.

While there have been some strategic gains in pressuring the moral obligation of Israel, and by extension of the Jewish state, towards those who escape persecution, it is important to note the overall failure of a human rights discourse and humanitarian compassion to resolve the crisis of asylum seekers in Israel. It is pertinent that in the Israeli dominant state discourse, a global human rights regime is considered to be mutually exclusive with the Zionist conception of an ethno-religious state whose value lies in securing the rights of Jewish-Israeli citizens.

Since December 2013, thousands of African asylum seekers have taken to the main streets and squares in Tel-Aviv and Jerusalem to protest their inhuman treatment by the government. Their demonstrations of political consciousness and activism are a powerful move that comes mostly out of despair and disillusionment with the failure of human rights law to resolve their humanitarian crises.

BARAK KALIR

is an associate professor at the University of Amsterdam.