This book has been a long time coming and many people have in some way paved its way. I would like to take this moment to recognize them and express my gratitude.

Fieldwork has been made possible by grants from the Amsterdam Institute for Social Science Research and Stichting Dr. Hendrik Muller Vaderlandsch Fonds. During fieldwork I benefited from the hospitality of the AUB, its Center for Behavioural Research and in particular Samir Khalaf, who set it all up. Later the AISSR and the Anthropology Department at Stanford were so kind as to facilitate my writing process with a short-term residency in Palo Alto (and Shelly Coughlan cheerfully and hospitably did most of the legwork for this). Marieke Beckerman provided me with an inspirational Scandinavian refuge to finish the first draft. Throughout the entire trajectory, the team of the AISSR secretariat provided a homey haven that gave meeting everyday academic challenges a pleasant twist. Thank you Teun Bijvoet, Anneke Dammers, José Komen, Miriam May, Hermance Mettrop, Joanne Oakes, Janus Oomen, and Yomi van der Veen. Muriël Kiesel is a rock.
Finally, a great thank you to Anita Hardon for your support at a crucial juncture.

The AISSR is a gathering place for many special and precious people. The fellows in the doctoral enterprise especially have enriched the experience. I’ve enjoyed their company and would like to mention by name those I’ve gotten to know a bit better: Anneke Beerkens, Silke Heumann, Lianne Holten, Paul van Hooft, Chip Huisman, Shifra Kisch, Rüya “Gökhan” Koçer, Paul Mepschen, Carla Rodrigues, Amalinda Savirani, Theo Rutayisire, and Arzu Ünal (and the Salsa gang deserve special mention for festive accompaniment on the way out).
To all the peoples in the field, and especially: Bassel Kassem for the music and the lyrics; Kevork Baboyan for encyclopaedic tours (and help with translations); Ali, Gustavo Barbosa, William Benton, Monika Halkort, Raghd, Léa, Kevork (yes, again), Khodor, Muzna al-Masri, and Karim Sadek for your friendship and many an engaging discussion; my interviewees for their time and openness; the residents of Khandaq, and especially Mahdi, Abu Ali, Mohammad, Bahshat and Qasem, for taking me in and for your comradery; Mona Fawaz, Ali Faour, Abdo Saad for making me see and for hooking me up; and Youssef, for helping me navigate Lebanese bureaucracy: thank you.

I’ve been fortunate with friends and colleagues who have taken their time to comment on my work. Vincent de Rooij helped with the research proposal; Niko Besnier was involved in the earlier stages of the project; Oskar Verkaaik provided his usual incisive critiques on two early attempts to figure things out; and Annemarie Mol shone light in the darkness during vrijmi Walking Seminars. Once I hit ‘chapter stage’, Donya Alinejad, Apostolos Andrikopoulos, Lidewyde Berckmoes, Yasemin Ipek Can, Paola Castaño, Julie McBrien, and Malini Sur all provided helpful and at times invaluable feedback.

To my advisors: Reinoud, thank you for being enthusiastic about the project and for showing the right doors in Lebanon and opening some of them. I have appreciated your knowledgeability, our amicable talks and that you’ve tried to keep me grounded. Thomas, I have enjoyed your erudition, your supervisory monologues and that you’ve encouraged me to fly. I’m also grateful you stood by me after our formal ties were severed and I’m slightly disconcerted to note how Hanselian this work has (I have?) become. Peter, thank you for joining me for the last haul. Your ruminations on my work have been inspiring and your comparisons with cases old and new enlightening. Mattijs, I’ve appreciated your moral and logistical support at the end. Allow me to take this moment to thank you more generally for being a generally wholesome presence and an inspiring and fun writer, speaker and interlocutor.

My parents have supported me lovingly and in every conceivable way throughout the years and nothing in my life, including this thesis, would exist in any recognizable form without it. My grandfather has been my greatest champion and I am happy I can present this book to him now. No longer am I able to present this book to my mother and grandmother. I would like to dedicate it to them instead.

Dear AIOs Anonymous (O.K., not so anonymous: Frank van As, Marieke van Eijk, Marcel van den Haak, Eline van Haastrecht, Sanneke Kloppenburg, Naomi van Stapele, Ana Miškovska Kajevska, and Anick Vollebergh):
I have felt privileged travelling along this path on your sides. You’ve been an essential and inextricable part of the whole thing. I will reserve all things sentimental for a more private moment and confine myself to say that both your moral support and substantive advice have helped me take the next step many a time. While this text now feels as though it is mine, in fact it isn’t, since I wouldn’t have been able to write it as is without you. (As these things go though, yours were the good ideas, mine the poor execution.)

And though they haven’t actually directly helped me produce this text, I still feel a special shout out to my friends (new and old, near and far) is appropriate here. I’d like to mention by name a few I’ve gotten to know a bit better: Delphine, Dewi, Jan, Kobe, and Scott. Thank you all for making life more beautiful.
