

UvA-DARE (Digital Academic Repository)

Universality, Diversity and Legal Certainty: Cultural Diversity in the Dialogue between the CEDAW and States Parties

Donders, Y.; Vleugel, V.

Publication date

2016

Document Version

Submitted manuscript

Published in

The Rule of Law at the national and international levels: contestations and deference

Link to publication

Citation for published version (APA):

Donders, Y., & Vleugel, V. (2016). Universality, Diversity and Legal Certainty: Cultural Diversity in the Dialogue between the CEDAW and States Parties. In M. Kanetake, & A. Nollkaemper (Eds.), The Rule of Law at the national and international levels: contestations and deference (pp. 321-351). (Studies in International Law; No. 56). Hart Publishing.

General rights

It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations

If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: <https://uba.uva.nl/en/contact>, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.

UNIVERSITY OF AMSTERDAM

UNIVERSALITY, DIVERSITY AND LEGAL CERTAINTY:
CULTURAL DIVERSITY IN THE DIALOGUE BETWEEN
CEDAW AND STATES PARTIES

Yvonne Donders

Vincent Vleugel

Amsterdam Law School Legal Studies Research Paper No. 2014-40

Amsterdam Center for International Law No. 2014-25

Amsterdam Center for International Law
University of Amsterdam

RESEARCH PAPER SERIES

INTERFACES Research Paper 06 (2014), ACIL 2014-25

Universality, Diversity and Legal Certainty:
Cultural Diversity in the Dialogue between
CEDAW and States Parties

Yvonne Donders & Vincent Vleugel
Amsterdam Center for International Law

Cite as: INTERFACES Research Paper 06 (2014), ACIL 2014-25, available at www.acil.uva.nl and SSRN

Forthcoming in: *The Rule of Law at the National and International Levels:
Contestations and Deference*, Oxford: Hart Publishing (2015)

The Research Project on Interfaces Between National and International Legal Orders (INTERFACES) is hosted by the Amsterdam Center for International Law (ACIL) of the University of Amsterdam.

Universality, Diversity and Legal Certainty: Cultural Diversity in the Dialogue between CEDAW and States Parties

Yvonne Donders & Vincent Vleugel

I Introduction

It is nowadays broadly accepted that the universal value and application of international human rights norms does not imply a uniform implementation of these rights, thereby leaving room for local and culture specific implementation at the national level. The question remains, however, what the precise scope of that room is or should be. A common criticism of allowing for cultural diversity in the implementation of international human rights law is that it leads to relativism and to a lack of sufficient clarity and predictability of the norms, undermining legal certainty as constitutive element of the rule of law. It could however also be argued that a certain amount of flexibility allowing for cultural diversity is inherent in the international legal human rights system and is not detrimental to legal certainty.

This chapter analyses the room for variation in implementation based on cultural differences, as well as the process of determining this room by states parties and the treaty monitoring bodies. It analyses the dialogue as regards the elaboration of the normative content of the provisions, as well as the process of the dialogue itself. Both dimensions of content and process are linked to the principle of legal certainty.

States interpret and implement international human rights treaties in a way that fits their culture, history and local setting. International monitoring bodies, including UN treaty bodies, are set up to supervise the implementation of these treaties, including determining whether or not states comply with their obligations. Treaty bodies have various mechanisms at their disposal to carry out this task whereby states are involved to a greater or lesser extent. The periodic state reporting procedure, for instance, includes a dialogue with the states parties before the adoption of Concluding Observations by the Committees. The individual communications procedure involves states as party to the case on which the Committees express their ‘Views’ or Opinions.

This chapter focuses on the Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) and the states parties to the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (ICEDAW). The ICEDAW was selected because it is one of the most ratified human rights treaties, while at the same time containing provisions, for instance on equality between men and women in family matters, that have strong cultural connotations. Divergent views on some of the principle matters in the ICEDAW is also reflected in the large number of reservations to this treaty.

Aiming to clarify the implications of the interaction between states and CEDAW for the development of the international rule of law, the following issues are addressed below: to what extent and how does the dialogue between the CEDAW and states parties enable states to reiterate, revisit, or be challenged on the value of particular cultural norms and practices in relation to universal human rights? How does this dialogue relate to the development of consensus and certainty over the meaning of these rights? How does the interaction between states parties and the CEDAW take place and to what extent can truly be spoken of a dialogue? How does this process contribute to the possible conjuncture between legal certainty and (cultural) flexibility?

First, we introduce the concepts of cultural diversity and legal certainty (Section II). Then we provide an overview of the substantive issues of cultural diversity that come to the fore in the implementation of ICEDAW (Section III). We then analyse how these issues generate the practice of a dialogue in the state reporting procedure and the individual complaints procedure of the CEDAW, and how such a dialogue affects the meaning of conventional rights and the room for the culture-specific implementation (Section IV). We end with concluding remarks on the role of dialogue in mediating cultural diversity and legal certainty (Section V).

II Two Conceptual Issues on Cultural Diversity in International Human Rights Law

A Universality and Cultural Diversity

Cultural diversity is defined in article 2 of the UNESCO Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Diversity of Cultural Expressions as referring to ‘the manifold ways in which the cultures of groups and societies find expression. These expressions are passed on within and among groups and societies...’.¹ In this chapter, cultural diversity denotes the factual situation of cultural differences existing between and within states, whereby the term ‘cultural’ can refer to many things, including ethnicity, history, language, religion, customs etc.² Cultural diversity can operate at different levels: between states, regions, communities and individuals, but also within states, regions and communities.

Human rights and cultural diversity have been discussed extensively in the context of the universalism and cultural relativism debate.³ In an attempt to reconcile both universalism and cultural relativism, the predominant view now suggests that respect for cultural diversity can very well be consistent with the notion of the universality of human rights.⁴ Cultural relativism and universality do not have to mutually exclude each other if the former is understood as respect for cultural diversity as opposed to a challenge to the legitimacy of international human rights norms. The dichotomy can be overcome for instance by making a distinction between universality of the subjects to whom international human rights norms apply (beneficiaries) and universality of the normative content of the norms.

¹ Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Diversity of Cultural Expressions, adopted by the General Conference of UNESCO on 20 October 2005, entry into force on 18 March 2007.

² UNESCO uses the following definition of ‘culture’: ‘...the set of distinctive spiritual, material, intellectual and emotional features of society or a social group, and that it encompasses, in addition to art and literature, lifestyles, ways of living together, value systems, traditions and beliefs’, Universal Declaration on Cultural Diversity, 2001.

³ ‘Statement on Human Rights’, 49 American Anthropologist 539, 542, 1947, submitted to the UN Human Rights Commission drafting the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. On universalism and cultural relativism, see inter alia, Jack Donnelly, Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1989) 107–60; Douglas Lee Donoho, ‘Relativism versus Universalism in Human Rights: The Search for Meaningful Standards’ (1991) 27 Stanford Journal of International Law 345, 345–91; Fernand de Varennes, ‘Fallacies in the Universalism Versus Cultural Relativism Debate in Human Rights Law, The’ (2006) 7 Asia-Pacific Journal on Human Rights and the Law 67, 67–84; Eibe Riedel, ‘Universality of Human Rights and Cultural Pluralism’ in C Starck (ed), Constitutionalism, Universalism and Democracy: A Comparative Analysis: The German Contributions to the Fifth World Congress of the International Association of Constitutional Law (1999) 25–52; Ann-Belinda S Preis, ‘Human Rights as Cultural Practice: An Anthropological Critique’ (1996) 18 Human Rights Quarterly 286, 286–315.

⁴ See Chapter 11 (Andrew Legg) of this volume.

The idea that human rights should be universally enjoyed—by all persons on the basis of equality—is not very controversial. In general, the universality of the subjects of human rights is widely accepted. International human rights instruments clearly endorse this universal approach. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR)⁵ as well as the international human rights treaties speak of ‘everyone’, ‘all persons’ or ‘no one’, affirming that all human beings have these rights and freedoms, no matter where they were born or to which community they belong.

The universality of the normative content of human rights is, however, a different matter. It is increasingly agreed that the universal value and application of human rights does not necessarily imply the uniform implementation of these rights. In other words, while human rights apply universally to everyone on the basis of their human dignity, the implementation of these rights does not have to be uniform.⁶ The UDHR was meant to be a common standard of achievement, however without expecting fully uniform practices.⁷ This process has been given various names: the ‘universalisation’ of human rights⁸, the ‘relative universality of human rights’,⁹ or ‘inclusive universality’.¹⁰ In other words, universal human rights do not have to be ⁵ Universal Declaration on Human Rights, adopted and proclaimed by General Assembly resolution 217 A (III) of 10 December 1948.

⁶ The European Court of Human Rights has adopted this approach by stating that, while the purpose of the European Convention on Human Rights was to lay down international standards, ‘this does not mean that absolute uniformity is required’. See Sunday Times v. United Kingdom App No 13166/87 (ECtHR, 26 November 1991) para 61.

⁷ Mary Ann Glendon, ‘Rule of Law in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, The’ (2004) 2 Northwestern University Journal of International Human Rights 1, 15.

⁸ Advisory Council on International Affairs, Universality of Human Rights. Principles, Practice and Prospects, Advice No. 63 (The Hague, November 2008) 19.

⁹ Jack Donnelly, ‘The Relative Universality of Human Rights’ (2007) 29 Human Rights Quarterly 281, 281, 300. Donnelly argues that ‘universal human rights, properly understood, leave considerable space for national, regional, cultural particularity and other forms of diversity and relativity’.

¹⁰ Eva Brems, ‘Reconciling Universality and Diversity in International Human Rights: A Theoretical and Methodological Framework and Its Application in the Context of Islam’ (2004) 5 Human Rights Review 5, 11–12; Eva Brems, ‘Reconciling Universality and Diversity in International Human Rights Law’ in A Sajó (ed), Human Rights with Modesty: the Problem of Universalism (Leiden; Boston, M Nijhoff Publishers, 2004) 213, 223–25. Other authors agree that the international human rights system should be or is flexible enough to integrate cultural differences: Niels Petersen, ‘International Law, Cultural Diversity, and Democratic Rule: Beyond the Divide Between Universalism and Relativism’ (2011) 1 Asian Journal of International Law 149, 149–50; David Kinley, ‘Bendable Rules: The Development Implications of Human Rights Pluralism’ in BZ Tamanaha, CM Sage and MJV Woolcock (eds), Legal Pluralism and Development: Scholars and Practitioners in Dialogue (Cambridge; New York, Cambridge University Press, 2012) 50, 50–65. Other authors, however, also emphasise the need for a flexible and dynamic approach of cultures, see Preis, ‘Human Rights as Cultural Practice’ (n 18) 296–97; Brems, ‘Reconciling Universality and Diversity in International Human Rights Law’ 226–27.

implemented in a uniform way, thereby leaving room for variation at national level. This process is monitored by international monitoring bodies.

B Legal Certainty

Legal certainty is often considered as one of the central elements of the rule of law, which is mainly developed at national level.¹¹ Legal certainty serves to provide individuals with a predictable environment, which guides them in complying with the law and protects them from arbitrary government action by controlling government power to make and apply the law. Legal certainty concerns how the law is made, how it is interpreted and how it is applied.¹² According to the European Court of Human Rights, legal certainty, in particular the aspect of foreseeability, ‘...requires that all law be sufficiently precise to allow the person – if need be, with appropriate advice – to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail’.¹³ Consequently, laws and decisions must be made public, they must be definite and clear and retroactivity of laws and decisions must be strictly limited.¹⁴

It is sometimes argued that legal certainty prevents flexibility, which would be necessary for laws to function. For instance, courts must have a certain amount of freedom to interpret and apply a norm in a particular case. Others maintain that the law

¹¹ Jeremy Waldron, ‘The Rule of International Law’ (2006) 30 Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 15, 17; Jeremy Waldron, ‘Are Sovereigns Entitled to the Benefit of the International Rule of Law?’ (2011) 22 European Journal of International Law 315, 316–17; James R Maxeiner, ‘Some Realism about Legal Certainty in the Globalization of the Rule of Law’ (2008) 31 Houston Journal of International Law 27, 28; Ofer Raban, ‘Fallacy of Legal Certainty: Why Vague Legal Standards May Be Better for Capitalism and Liberalism, The’ (2010) 19 Boston University Public Interest Law Journal 175, 177–78; Report of the Secretary-General, ‘The Rule of Law and Transitional Justice in Conflict and Post-conflict Societies’ UN Doc. S/2004/616 (23 August 2004) para 6. Also, G8 Foreign Ministers Declaration on the Rule of Law (2007) described the Rule of Law as including the principles of supremacy of law, equality before the law, accountability to the law, legal certainty, procedural and legal transparency, equal and open access to justice for all, irrespective of gender, race, religion, age, class, creed or other status, avoidance of arbitrary application of the law, and eradication of corruption.

¹² Maxeiner, ‘Some Realism about Legal Certainty’ (n 3) 36, 38; Paul Heinrich Neuhaus, ‘Legal Certainty versus Equity in the Conflict of Laws’ (1963) 28 Law and Contemporary Problems 795, 802–3.

¹³ Korchuganova v Russia App. No. 75039/01 (ECtHR, 8 June 2006), para 46.

¹⁴ Maxeiner, ‘Some Realism about Legal Certainty’ (n 3) 32, 36, 38; Waldron, ‘The Rule of International Law’ (n 3) 17. Legal certainty is also often linked to criminal punishment, such as is laid down in Article 7 ECHR, including the prohibition of being convicted retroactively or increase the penalty retroactively. A person can only be convicted for an act or omission which constituted a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed.

should be as clear as possible, precisely to avoid that courts go beyond what was meant by the legislator.

To what extent can the legal certainty principle be transposed to the international level as part of an international rule of law? Firstly, the precise scope, meaning and implications of the concept of the rule of law at the international level remain debated.¹⁵ In this chapter, the concept of the rule of law at international level refers to the so-called rule of law ‘internationalised’, meaning the externalisation and application of rule of law values within the international legal order.¹⁶ The UN also adheres to this meaning of the international rule of law, whereby the principles of the rule of law provide a regulatory framework for international institutions, international normativity and international adjudication.¹⁷

Legal certainty as part of an international rule of law would imply that treaties and treaty provisions should be sufficiently clear and precise to be predictable and foreseeable. It seems that achieving legal certainty at the international level is more difficult than at the national level.¹⁸ Since international human rights law is primarily formed by states that have different historical, political and cultural backgrounds, one may question how legal certainty is understood and materialised in the practice of international human rights law. Although applying the rule of law element of legal certainty at the international level should force states to create international human rights law in the most clear and foreseeable way, it appears that international human rights treaties are, par excellence, characterised by the use of broad and vague language and open-ended concepts. Human rights treaties are the products of long negotiations and political compromise among a variety of states with different interests, a process

¹⁵ See Chapter 2 (Machiko Kanetake) of this volume.

¹⁶ This idea is taken from Stéphane Beaulac, ‘Lost in Transition? Domestic Courts, International Law and Rule of Law “À la Carte”’ in E Kristjánssdóttir, A Nollkaemper and C Ryngaert (eds), International Law in Domestic Courts: Rule of Law Reform in Post-Conflict States (Cambridge, Intersentia, 2012) 17, 20. Beaulac distinguishes this from the ‘internationalisation’ of the rule of law, which refers to the exportation of the rule of law at national level, via the international plane, to other domestic levels, mainly in relation to conflict, post-conflict situations and long-term development situations.

¹⁷ Beulac, Ibid; Randall Peerenboom, Michael Zürn and André Nollkaemper, ‘Conclusion: From Rule of Law Promotion to Rule of Law Dynamics’ in M Zürn, A Nollkaemper and R Peerenboom (eds), Rule of Law Dynamics: In an Era of International and Transnational Governance (Cambridge University Press, 2012) 305, 314–15; Simon Chesterman, ‘An International Rule of Law?’ (2008) 56 American Journal of Comparative Law 331, 341 and 355-356.

¹⁸ Waldron argues that because of the absence of an overarching sovereign at the international level, the RoL principles, including legal certainty, are more difficult to realize. Waldron, ‘Are Sovereigns Entitled to the Benefit of the International Rule of Law?’ (n 3) 320.

that does not do well for clarity and unambiguous language. This vagueness may be problematic for legal certainty. At the same time it could be argued that the subject matter – human rights – is so multidimensional and complex that it does not lend itself to reduction to clear and unambiguous language.¹⁹ Moreover, states may keep international human rights law deliberately vague, because it provides them a framework leaving flexibility to implement and apply human rights at national level.

Some have called predictability, including clarity and stability, of laws and adjudication ‘formal’ legal certainty, distinguishing it from ‘substantive’ legal certainty, which refers to the rational acceptability of laws and adjudication.²⁰ This distinction draws on the fact that even if laws are sufficiently clear and predictable, fulfilling the criteria of formal legal certainty, their application in concrete situations cannot and perhaps should not be fully predictable. This situation therefore highlights the importance of argumentation and justification by supervisory bodies in order to achieve rational acceptability, in other words substantive legal certainty.²¹ The issue of context sensitivity, flexibility and thereby possible unpredictability in the application and implementation of norms, as well as the importance of clear and consistent argumentation by international supervisory bodies²² is very relevant for international human rights law.

International monitoring bodies provide a procedural safeguard related to formal legal certainty and they play an important role in promoting substantive legal certainty, in other words the acceptability of the outcome of the procedures, for instance by providing clear and well-justified arguments.²³ This is all the more necessary in an international context, where language, concepts and principles may differ widely. Indeed international law is not homogenous in terms of content and application.²⁴

¹⁹ Raban, ‘Fallacy of Legal Certainty’ (n 3) 188, 191.

²⁰ Elina Paunio, ‘Beyond Predictability - Reflections on legal Certainty and the Discourse Theory of Law in the EU Legal Order’ (2009) 10 German Law Journal 1469. The author maintains to follow legal theorists such as Habermas, Aulis Aarnio and Alexander Peczenik in drawing this distinction.

²¹ Paunio, ibid 1473-1475.

²² We use the term ‘monitoring’ or ‘supervision’, since the procedures of the treaty bodies are quasi-judicial and cannot be truly called ‘adjudication’.

²³ Paunio, ‘Beyond Predictability - Reflections on legal Certainty and the Discourse Theory of Law in the EU Legal Order’ (n 10) 1475–76.

²⁴ Stephan calls the assumption that international law is homogenous the ‘homogeneity fallacy’. Paul B Stephan, ‘Rethinking the International Rule of Law: The Homogeneity Fallacy and International Law’s Threat to Itself’ (2012) 4 Jerusalem Review of Legal Studies 19, 19–41.

Treaties often need to balance certainty and reliability against flexibility.²⁵ Treaty provisions should be in principle defined as clearly as possible, but flexibility is needed for the individual application of the treaty provisions. A certain amount of flexibility is not necessarily a weakness; it could also be a strength, because ‘...application of the norm occasions, frames and facilitates a certain process of reflection and argumentation’, which is an important process.²⁶

With regard to UN human rights treaties, not only states but also treaty bodies play an important role in this balancing process. States draft the treaties and apply and implement their provisions at national level. Treaty bodies supervise the application and implementation by states parties and thereby play a crucial role in the interpretation of the scope, content and application of treaty norms. The outcome of this process in terms of determining the scope and content of international norms, as well as the process itself, could be important elements in creating or improving legal certainty.

III Cultural Diversity in the Implementation of the ICEDAW

The aforementioned process of balancing between cultural diversity and legal certainty comes to the fore in the implementation of the ICEDAW. This comes as no surprise, because gender-based differentiation is often justified with religious, cultural and historical arguments.²⁷ This section focuses on the question how much room and flexibility the Committee leaves to states parties to interpret and apply the treaty provisions in conformity with their cultural background, as well as the question to what extent the Committee is consistent and clear in its approach towards the cultural diversity argument.

²⁵ See Joseph Raz, ‘Legal Principles and the Limits of Law’ (1972) 81 Yale Law Journal 823, 842. See also Waldron, ‘Are Sovereigns Entitled to the Benefit of the International Rule of Law?’ (n 3) 336..

²⁶ Waldron, ‘Are Sovereigns Entitled to the Benefit of the International Rule of Law?’ (n 3) 336; Neuhaus, ‘Legal Certainty versus Equity in the Conflict of Laws’ (n 4) 804.

²⁷ C Chinkin, ‘Reservations and Objections to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women’, in JP Gardner (ed), Human Rights as General Norms and a State’s Right to Opt Out: Reservations and Objections to Human Rights Conventions (London, BIICL, 1997) 77; Eric Neumayer, ‘Qualified Ratification: Explaining Reservations to International Human Rights Treaties’ (2007) 36(2) Journal of Legal Studies 397, 404.

A Cultural Diversity and Non-Discrimination

Core principle of all human rights treaties and the ICEDAW in particular is the obligation of states to ensure equal enjoyment of human rights and to prevent and put an end to all forms of discrimination. This may imply taking special measures to promote and protect inclusion and participation of all women, including those from ethnic, racial and sexual minorities. Discrimination against women often not only concerns their gender, but also their ethnic or cultural background. Women often suffer from what the Committee calls intersectional discrimination, multiple forms of discrimination or compounded discrimination, and the state is called upon (by the Committee) to protect and promote the rights of these groups.²⁸

The equality principle however also implies the right to be different, in other words, the ICEDAW also creates obligations of states to recognise the special situation of certain groups of women and to take special measures to sustain diversity. This follows from the recognition that respect for cultural differences can be fully in line with the principle of equality. Having equal rights is not the same as being treated equally. Indeed, equality and non-discrimination not only imply that equal situations should be treated equally, but also that unequal situations should be treated unequally. At the international level, it was understood that ‘the enjoyment of rights and freedoms on an equal footing...does not mean identical treatment in every instance’.²⁹ Consequently, not all difference in treatment constitutes discrimination, as long as the criteria for differentiation are reasonable and objective and serve a legitimate aim.³⁰ Difference in treatment may also involve affirmative or positive action to remedy historical injustices, social discrimination or to create diversity and proportional group representation.³¹

²⁸ The Committee’s recommendations to States parties may vary from negative obligations (‘respect the Bedouin population’s right to their ancestral land and their traditional livelihood’, Concluding Observations Israel) to positive obligations (‘improve access to health services for all women and in particular for the most vulnerable groups of women, such as indigenous, Afro- and Asian-descendant women’, Concluding Observations Panama). The recommendations of the Committee tend to be very general, such as its recommendation to ‘address the disparities that disadvantaged women face’, to ‘intensify its efforts to eliminate discrimination against disadvantaged groups of women’, to ‘adopt proactive measures, including temporary special measures, to eliminate such discrimination’, to ‘implement effective measures to eliminate discrimination and violence against women belonging to religious minorities’, to ‘conduct regular and comprehensive studies on discrimination against disadvantaged groups of women’, or to ‘provide information on specific measures taken by the State party to ensure gender equality for women, who experience intersectional discrimination based on factors such as ethnicity, religion, (...) and sexual orientation, in all areas covered under the Convention’.

²⁹ Human Rights Committee, ‘General Comment No. 18, Non-Discrimination’ (10 November 1989) para 8. The European Court of Human Rights has reaffirmed this in many cases, including the following cases: Thlimmenos v Greece App No 34369/97 (ECtHR, 6 April 2000) para 44; D.H. and others v the Czech Republic App No 57325/00 (ECtHR, 7 February 2006) para 44.

Culture may also function as an underlying cause of discrimination against women, or its practices may be considered discriminatory in themselves. Many discriminatory practices are grounded in custom and stereotyping. The ICEDAW combats both these (cultural) practices and the underlying (cultural) beliefs.³² The Convention requires states parties to abandon the defence of such harmful custom and to promote new attitudes.³³ The analysis below shows that the Committee actively supervises this requirement, not leaving much room for the cultural diversity argument, if at all.

B Cultural Stereotypes, Attitudes and Practices

The CEDAW has on many occasions expressed its concern about cultural or traditional stereotypes, attitudes and practices that determine the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and society and that may pose obstacles to the enjoyment of the rights or cause violations of these rights. This concern is linked to Article 5(a)

³⁰ Legal doctrine generally distinguishes between differentiation, distinction and discrimination. Differentiation is difference in treatment that is lawful; distinction is a neutral term which is used when it has not yet been determined whether difference in treatment is lawful or not; and discrimination is difference in treatment that is arbitrary and unlawful. Consequently, only treatment that results in discrimination is prohibited. See M Bossuyt, 'Prevention of Discrimination: The Concept and Practice of Affirmative Action' UN Doc. E/CN.4/Sub. 2/2002/21 (17 June 2002) para 91 at 20.

³¹ See also Article 1(4) of the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, adopted by General Assembly resolution 2106 (XX) of 21 December 1965, entry into force on 4 January 1969: 'Special measures taken for the sole purpose of securing adequate advancement of certain racial or ethnic groups or individuals requiring such protection as may be necessary in order to ensure such groups or individuals equal enjoyment or exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms shall not be deemed racial discrimination, provided, however, that such measures do not, as a consequence, lead to the maintenance of separate rights for different racial groups and that they shall not be continued after the objectives for which they were taken have been achieved'. The Human Rights Committee has further stated that the principle of equality under Article 26 ICCPR may sometimes require States parties to take affirmative action to diminish or eliminate conditions which cause or help to perpetuate discrimination prohibited by the ICCPR. Human Rights Committee, 'General Comment No. 18, Non-Discrimination' (10 November 1989) para 10.

³² Freeman, M.A., Chinkin, C. and Rudolf, B. (eds), 'The UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women: A Commentary' (Oxford University Press, 2012), 156

³³ Freeman et al., ibid., 161

ICEDAW, which secures that ‘States Parties shall take all appropriate measures...to modify the social and cultural patterns of conduct of men and women, with a view to achieving the elimination of prejudices and customary and all other practices which are based on the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of either of the sexes or on stereotyped roles for men and women’.

Cultural practices and beliefs under the scope of Article 5 may range from traditional harmful practices and beliefs, such as female genital mutilation, forced and early marriages, levirate, sororate and polygamy (e.g. in Cote d’Ivoire),³⁴ to machismo culture (e.g. in Nicaragua),³⁵ overemphasis on the traditional roles of women as mothers and spouses (e.g. in Belarus),³⁶ segregation of the labour market and in educational choices (e.g. in Brazil),³⁷ portraying immigrant and migrant women and men as being backward (e.g. in The Netherlands),³⁸ and stereotyping of women as sex objects and in traditional roles in the media (e.g. in Italy).³⁹ Hence, Article 5 covers practices and beliefs in all possible cultures and contexts. The issue of cultural or traditional stereotypes, attitudes and practices is not only discussed in general terms, but also in relation to specific rights. For example, violence against women is often considered ‘socially legitimized’⁴⁰, or linked to ‘the persistence of sociocultural attitudes condoning such violence’.⁴¹ Such violence may be underreported due to ‘the prevalence

³⁴ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Cote d’Ivoire’ CEDAW/C/CIV/CO/1-3 (8 November 2011) para 26

³⁵ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Nicaragua’ A/56/38 (1 January 2001) para 294; although CEDAW no longer uses the word “machismo”; see Summary Records Bolivia, CEDAW/C/SR.811 (20 February 2008) para 55

³⁶ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Belarus’ CEDAW/C/BLR/CO/7 (4 February 2011) para 17

³⁷ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Brazil’ CEDAW/C/BRA/CO/7 (23 March 2012) para 27

³⁸ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: The Netherlands’ CEDAW/C/NLD/CO/5 (5 February 2010) para 24

³⁹ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Italy’ CEDAW/C/ITA/CO/6 (26 July 2011) para 24-25

⁴⁰ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Uganda’ CEDAW/C/UGA/CO/7 (22 October 2010) para 23; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Turkmenistan’ CEDAW/C/TKM/CO/3-4 (24 October 2012) para 22.

⁴¹ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Italy’ CEDAW/C/ITA/CO/6 (26 July 2011) para 26; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Bulgaria’ CEDAW/C/BGR/CO/4-7 (27 July 2012) para 25.

of discriminatory social and cultural norms’⁴² or ‘cultural taboos’⁴³. In its General Recommendation on violence against women the Committee addresses these cultural dimensions, arguing (under article 2(f) and 5) that ‘traditional attitudes by which women are regarded as subordinate to men or as having stereotyped roles perpetuate widespread practices involving violence or coercion, such as family violence and abuse, forced marriage, dowry deaths, acid attacks and female circumcision’,⁴⁴ and (under article 12) that ‘in some States there are traditional practices perpetuated by culture and tradition that are harmful to the health of women and children’.⁴⁵

Sociocultural factors may also prevent women from accessing healthcare services.⁴⁶ Women may face difficulties in accessing family planning services due to stigmatisation of abortion and contraception.⁴⁷ Sometimes women need the consent from their husband or a male guardian to undergo medical treatment.⁴⁸ Sociocultural factors may form obstacles to access by women from minority groups to health care services,⁴⁹ or there may be discrimination against lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex women in the provision of healthcare services.⁵⁰ In its General Recommendation on women and health the Committee requests that states demonstrate ‘...that health legislation, plans and policies are based on...assessment of the health ⁴² See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Greece’ CEDAW/C/GRC/CO/7 (1 March 2013) para 20; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Jamaica’ CEDAW/C/JAM/CO/6-7 (27 July 2012) para 21.

⁴³ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Chad’ CEDAW/C/TCD/CO/1-4 (21 October 2011) para 22.

⁴⁴ CEDAW, ‘General Recommendation No. 19’ UN Doc A/47/38 (1992) para 11.

⁴⁵ Ibid, para 20

⁴⁶ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Angola’ CEDAW/C/AGO/CO/6 (27 March 2013) para 31; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Togo’ CEDAW/C/TGO/CO/6-7 (8 November 2012) para 34;

⁴⁷ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Hungary’ CEDAW/C/HUN/CO/7-8 (25 March 2013) para 30

⁴⁸ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Indonesia’ CEDAW/C/IDN/CO/6-7 (7 August 2012) para 41; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kuwait’ CEDAW/C/KWT/CO/3-4 (8 November 2011) para 42

⁴⁹ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Congo’ CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6 (22 March 2012) para 35; CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Norway’ CEDAW/C/NOR/CO/8 (22 March 2012) para 31

⁵⁰ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Norway’ CEDAW/C/NOR/CO/8 (22 March 2012) para 33

status and needs of women in that country and take into account any ethnic, regional or community variations or practices based on religion, tradition or culture'.⁵¹

Cultural considerations further play an important role in marriage and family relations. The dissolution of marriage, inheritance, property rights, custody and guardianship of children are often subject to customary and religious laws and practices. Acknowledging that there are various forms and concepts of the family between and within states, the Committee submits that '...whatever the legal system, religion, custom or tradition within the country, the treatment of women in the family both at law and in private must accord with the principles of equality and justice for all people'.⁵² The Committee further notes the potential difference between laws and practice: '...while most countries report that national constitutions and laws comply with the Convention, custom, tradition and failure to enforce these laws in reality contravene the Convention'.⁵³

There are cultural practices in relation to marriage that are problematic from a human rights perspective, such as early and forced marriage, levirate, bride price (dowry), or polygamy. The Committee often expresses concerns about the prevalence of traditional stereotypes of women in relation to their role in the family,⁵⁴ or discriminatory legal provisions and negative customary practices related to marriage and family relations, which reflects the lack of advancement of the status of women in the society.⁵⁵ In its General Recommendation on equality in marriage and family relations the Committee, for instance '...notes with concern that some States parties, whose constitutions guarantee equal rights, permit polygamous marriage in accordance with personal or customary law'. It considers this a violation of women's rights, in particular of article 5(a) of the Convention.⁵⁶ As regards the division of marital property, the Committee argues that '...any discrimination in the division of property that rests on the premise that the man alone is responsible for the support of the women and children

⁵¹ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 24' UN Doc A/54/38/Rev.1 (1999) para 9.

⁵² Ibid, para 13

⁵³ Ibid, para 15

⁵⁴ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Jamaica' CEDAW/C/JAM/CO/6-7 (7 August 2012) para 37

⁵⁵ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Congo' CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6 (22 March 2012) para 43

⁵⁶ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 21: Equality in Marriage and Family Relations' (1994) para 14

of his family and that he can and will honourably discharge this responsibility is clearly unrealistic'.⁵⁷

With regard to participation in political and public life the Committee expressed concerns that systematic barriers such as negative cultural attitudes impede women's equal participation in political life.⁵⁸ In its General Recommendation on political and public life, the Committee considers that '...in all nations, the most significant factors inhibiting women's ability to participate in public life have been the cultural framework of values and religious beliefs', and that 'in all nations, cultural traditions and religious beliefs have played a part in confining women to the private spheres of activity and excluding them from active participation in public life'.⁵⁹ When reporting, states parties are requested to provide details of any restrictions to those rights, '... whether arising from legal provisions or from traditional, religious or cultural practices'.⁶⁰

Access to education may also be affected by cultural considerations. Harmful practices, such as early and forced marriages, are identified as barriers to girls' education,⁶¹ as are negative cultural attitudes and excessive domestic duties.⁶² The Committee also regularly expresses concerns regarding stereotyped educational choices⁶³ and persistent inequalities in the access to education for girls on the basis of race, ethnicity and socio-economic background.⁶⁴ According to the Committee,

⁵⁷ Ibid, para 28

⁵⁸ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Turkmenistan' CEDAW/C/TKM/CO/3-4 (9 November 2012) para 26; CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Greece' CEDAW/C/GRC/CO/7 (25 March 2013) para 24; CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Zimbabwe' CEDAW/C/ZWE/CO/2-5 (22 March 2012) para 27

⁵⁹ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 23: Political and Public Life' UN Doc A/52/38 (1997) para 10.

⁶⁰ Ibid, para 48(b).

⁶¹ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Togo' CEDAW/C/TGO/CO/6-7 (8 November 2012) para 30; 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Zimbabwe' CEDAW/C/ZWE/CO/2-5 (22 March 2012) para 29

⁶² See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Turkmenistan' CEDAW/C/TKM/CO/3-4 (9 November 2012) para 31

⁶³ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Turkey' CEDAW/C/TUR/CO/6 (16 August 2010) para 30

⁶⁴ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Brazil' CEDAW/C/BRA/CO/7 (22 March 2012) para 24

women's subordinate roles⁶⁵ and child-rearing responsibilities⁶⁶ within the family contribute to their lower level of education. At the same time, education is often discussed by the Committee as a vehicle or means to change those very same negative cultural practices and attitudes. The Committee for instance regularly recommends states to adopt education and information programmes which will help eliminate prejudices and change attitudes concerning the roles and status of men and women.⁶⁷

When discussing employment, a repeated concern is occupational segregation, with women taking up low-paid traditional jobs and part-time work, often due to their parallel traditional role of caregivers for children and the elderly.⁶⁸ In some countries, when women get married, they tend to become exclusively responsible for care work.⁶⁹ Certain vulnerable groups, in particular from minority communities, may be excluded from the formal labour market,⁷⁰ or suffer from segregation into lower quality jobs, based on stereotypes related to gender, race and ethnicity.⁷¹

These examples show that, at least when it comes to the implementation of the ICEDAW, culture is not the flexibility tool that it is sometimes held out to be. The Committee is very critical of cultural arguments that undermine the working of the treaty. It seems that it broadly prefers a universality approach over a flexibility approach. It should, however, be noted that the analysis above is based on issues that were raised by the Committee. A full insight in the possible flexibility left to states parties to interpret and implement the treaty provisions in conformity with their cultural background would also require exploring the issues not raised by the Committee. For example, why does the Committee decide to express its concerns on discrimination of ⁶⁵ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 19: Violence against Women' (1992) para 11.

⁶⁶ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 21: Equality in Marriage and Family Relations' UN Doc A/49/38 (1994) para 21

⁶⁷ CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 3: Education and Public Information Campaigns' UN Doc A/42/38 (1987); CEDAW, 'General Recommendation No. 19: Violence against Women' (1992) para 24(t)(ii).

⁶⁸ General Recommendation No. 21 on equality in marriage and family relations establishes that access to employment is affected by women's traditional role of bearing and raising children (para 21); CO Canada

⁶⁹ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Oman' CEDAW/C/OMN/CO/1 (3 November 2011) para 37

⁷⁰ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Bulgaria' CEDAW/C/BGR/CO/4-7 (7 August 2012) para 33; CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Hungary' CEDAW/C/HUN/CO/7-8 (25 March 2013) para 36

⁷¹ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Brazil' CEDAW/C/BRA/CO/7 (22 March 2012) para 26

lesbian, bisexual, transgender and intersex women in Norway,⁷² while it is silent on the issue in Uganda,⁷³ a country where at the time an ‘anti-homosexuality bill’ was pending,⁷⁴ with life imprisonment as the minimum punishment for anyone convicted of having gay sex.⁷⁵ Is this a sign of cultural sensitivity? Or a sign of double standards? Or are there too many other, more pressing issues that need to be raised? In other words, determining the room for cultural diversity involves many factors and is a very complex process. While it is important to keep this complexity in mind, there seems to be a convincing argument for the conclusion that the Committee leaves states parties little to no room for cultural variation in the implementation of the Convention.

Having established that the Committee is very critical and restrictive when it comes to accepting cultural variation in the implementation of the Convention, the question arises to what extent states parties – nonetheless – engage in a dialogue with the Committee. The next sections analyse the processes of dialogue between the Committee and states parties on issues of cultural diversity.

IV The Processes of Dialogue between the Committee and States Parties

This section focuses on the processes of dialogue between the Committee and the states parties. Which procedures exist for the Committee and states to interact? To what extent do states accept this critical and restrictive stance of the Committee? Do states – nonetheless – use the opportunity to explain their views on the value of specific cultural norms and practices in relation to the obligations under ICEDAW? And how receptive

⁷² See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Norway’ CEDAW/C/NOR/CO/8 (22 March 2012) para 33

⁷³ See, eg, CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Uganda’ CEDAW/C/UGA/CO/7 (4 November 2010)

⁷⁴ The Bill can be read in full at <http://www.scribd.com/doc/208846690/The-Anti-Homosexuality-Bill-2009-in-full>

⁷⁵ Rice, X. (2009, November 29) Uganda considers death sentence for gay sex in bill before parliament. The Guardian. Retrieved from <http://www.theguardian.com/world/2009/nov/29/uganda-death-sentence-gay-sex> (last visited 19 May 2014); On 24 February 2014, a revised version of the law was signed by Ugandan President Museveni. See, eg, Karimi, F. and Thompson, N. (2014, February 25) Uganda's President Museveni signs controversial anti-gay bill into law. CNN International Edition, Retrieved from <http://edition.cnn.com/2014/02/24/world/africa/uganda-anti-gay-bill/> and/or responsive is the Committee towards such views? In other words how does the dialogue between the state and the Committee take place and how ‘constructive’ is this dialogue in practice?

A Forums for Interaction between the Committee and States Parties

The Committee monitors compliance by states with their obligations under ICEDAW. The procedures at its disposal—the periodic state reporting procedure and the individual communications procedure—have different levels of state involvement and thereby of interaction or dialogue between the Committee and states. The reporting procedure means that the state has to report to the Committee on how the state has implemented the Convention. Initial reports should “outline any distinctions, exclusions or restrictions made on the basis of sex and gender (..) imposed by law, practice or tradition, or in any other manner on women’s enjoyment of each provision of the Convention”.⁷⁶ Subsequent periodic reports should contain information on the implementation of recommendations (‘Concluding Observations’) to the previous report and explanations for the non-implementation or difficulties encountered, as well as information on any remaining or emerging obstacles to the exercise and enjoyment by women of their human rights, and on measures envisaged to overcome these obstacles.⁷⁷

A pre-session working group of the Committee then drafts a short list of issues and questions, indicating the main points it wants to discuss with the state. Then a ‘constructive dialogue’ takes place. The Committee takes two (open) meetings of each three hours for consideration of initial and periodic reports. Representatives of the State party may make introductory comments for a maximum of 30 minutes, followed by several rounds of questions and answers, until all articles have been covered.⁷⁸ The minutes of the meeting are laid down in an official document, called Summary Records. The dialogue leads to the adoption of Concluding Observations by the Committee, which include only issues and concerns raised during the constructive dialogue.⁷⁹ In

⁷⁶ Compilation of Guidelines on the Form and Content of Reports to be Submitted by States Parties to the International Human Rights Treaties, HRI/GEN/2/Rev.5 (29 May 2008), Chapter V, para. D.3

⁷⁷ Ibid., Chapter V

⁷⁸ Ibid., para. 11-12

⁷⁹ Ibid., para. 18

other words, states are actively involved in this process and can take the opportunity to explain their views, even though the Concluding Observations are adopted by the Committee as independent supervisor. The Concluding Observations are not shared in advance with the state party and only afterwards can be commented upon by the state party. At the same time, the observations are meant as recommendations or practical advice for improving implementation of treaty rights, and do not have legally binding force.⁸⁰ Even though the Committee strives “to formulate detailed Concluding Observations, with concrete, achievable, but non-prescriptive recommendations”⁸¹, in reality the Concluding Observations generally concern broad recommendations about legislative and other measures states parties should take. Rather than making recommendations on an article-by-article basis, the Concluding Observations use subject headings, which are used flexibly.⁸² No explicit reference is made to the articles of the Convention. The Concluding Observations consequently provide limited insight into the scope and normative content of specific Convention articles.

While the reporting procedure is compulsory for each state party, the individual communications procedure needs to be specifically accepted by states, via an Optional Protocol.⁸³ The cases are initiated and brought by individuals after national remedies are exhausted.⁸⁴ After a communication has been received, the Committee brings it confidentially to the attention of the State party, with a request to submit, within 6 months, a written reply concerning the admissibility of the communication and its merits.⁸⁵ The Committee then transmits to each party the submissions made by the other party and affords them an opportunity to comment.⁸⁶ The whole procedure is written and confidential; no oral hearings take place. The Committee finally presents its Views on the case, concluding whether or not a violation of the treaty provision has taken

⁸⁰ Daniel Moeckli, Sangeeta Shah and Sandesh Sivakumaran (eds), International Human Rights Law (Oxford University Press, 2010), 407

⁸¹ Compilation of Guidelines on the Form and Content of Reports to be Submitted by States Parties to the International Human Rights Treaties, HRI/GEN/2/Rev.5 (29 May 2008), Chapter V, para. 21

⁸² Overview of the working methods of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women in relation to the reporting process, CEDAW/C/2009/II/4, para. 21

⁸³ Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, 6 October 1999, 2131 UNTS 83

⁸⁴ Ibid., Article 4

⁸⁵ Ibid., Article 6

⁸⁶ Rules of Procedure for the Optional Protocol to CEDAW, A/56/38, Rule 69(9)

place.⁸⁷ Although a simple majority is sufficient,⁸⁸ Committees generally adopt their views by consensus. Occasionally, individual members of the Committee attach separate (and dissenting) opinions. In case of a violation, the Committee may suggest remedies or compensation to the state party. The Views are not legally binding.⁸⁹ The state party is involved in the communication procedure, but more as respondent and less as active participant, as with the reporting procedure.

After the Committee has adopted its Views, the state party is requested to submit, within six months, a written response including information on the action taken following the Committee's recommendations. One member of the Committee is appointed as rapporteur for follow-up on Views. The Committee periodically decides whether further action is required and until the case is closed it reports to the General Assembly that 'the dialogue is on-going'.⁹⁰ Although the meetings that rapporteurs on follow-up have with states parties is considered as some form of continuing dialogue between the Committee and the state party, it should be noted that this dialogue takes place only after the View has been adopted. This means that the treaty norm interpretation (and thus the development of the general jurisprudence) has already been shaped.

The practice and experience of the Committee is laid down in General Recommendations, in which it comments on specific treaty provisions or elaborates on the relationship between the Convention and specific themes or issues.⁹¹ States parties play a limited and more indirect role in the adoption of these Recommendations. They are drafted and adopted by consensus by the Committee, whereby states parties are invited to comment on the draft text.⁹²

⁸⁷ Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, 6 October 1999, 2131 UNTS 83, Article 7

⁸⁸ Rules of Procedure for the Optional Protocol to CEDAW, A/56/38, Rule 72(5)

⁸⁹ Daniel Moeckli, Sangeeta Shah and Sandesh Sivakumaran (eds), International Human Rights Law (Oxford University Press, 2010), 412-413

⁹⁰ CEDAW Annual Report to GA, UN Doc A/64/38 (2009) at 111; Rules of Procedure of the CEDAW (UN Doc A/56/38 (SUPP), as amended by UN Doc A/62/38 (SUPP) Chapter V), Rule 73 on 'Follow-up to the views of the Committee'.

⁹¹ Report on the Working Methods of the Human Rights Treaty Bodies relating to the State Party Reporting Process, UN Doc HRI/MC/2005/4 (25 May 2005) 28, para 105.

⁹² Nisuke Ando, 'General Comments/Recommendations' in Rüdiger Wolfrum (ed.), The Max Planck Encyclopedia of Public International Law (Oxford University Press, 2008), online edition, [www.mpepil.com], visited on 15 May 2014.

B State Reporting Procedure: Three Modes of (Non-)Engagement

In order to unveil the practice of dialogue between the Committee and states parties regarding the room for cultural diversity, we have analysed the state reporting procedure of 30 states which took place between January 2010 and July 2013, including state periodic reports, (replies to) lists of issues and Concluding Observations. We selected the states on the basis of their geographic spread.⁹³ The analysis of the state reporting procedure is necessarily an intricate one, because states parties and the Committee categorise their reports differently. Since June 2008, the Committee includes subject headings – such as stereotypes and harmful practices, violence against women, health or education – in their Concluding Observations, which are to be used ‘flexibly and as appropriate for the State party concerned’.⁹⁴ By contrast, states parties usually categorize their reports according to the provisions of the Convention. This makes it difficult to identify which part of the Committee’s observations addresses which part of the state’s report. For example, the subject of violence against women has been linked to articles 2, 3, 5, 6, 10, 11, 12, 14 and 16 of the Convention.⁹⁵ At the same time, the practice of early marriage has not only been discussed under this subject, but also under legislative framework, stereotypes and harmful practices, education, employment, health, and marriage and family life, linking it to many different articles of the Convention. It is not uncommon that one issue is discussed under different articles or subjects throughout one reporting cycle. For example, in the reporting procedure of Bangladesh, the Committee requested information about early marriages under *stereotypes and harmful traditional practices*⁹⁶ and *health*⁹⁷ in its list of issues and questions, while it addressed early marriages in its Concluding Observations under

⁹³ Selection criteria: 6 countries from each of the 5 regions as identified by the UN: Africa Region; Americas Region; Asia Pacific Region; Europe, North America and Central Asia Region; Middle East and North Africa Region; see <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/Countries/Pages/HumanRightsintheWorld.aspx>

⁹⁴ ‘Overview of the working methods of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women in relation to the reporting process’, CEDAW/C/2009/II/4, para 21

⁹⁵ CEDAW, General Recommendation No. 19: Violence against Women’ (1992) paras 10-23.

⁹⁶ CEDAW, ‘List of issues and questions: Bangladesh’ CEDAW/C/BGD/Q/7 (6 September 2010) para 8

⁹⁷ CEDAW, ‘List of issues and questions: Bangladesh’ CEDAW/C/BGD/Q/7 (6 September 2010) para 18

*education*⁹⁸ and marriage and family relations.⁹⁹ The Committee does this consciously, for reasons of flexibility, but it complicates the analysis of a dialogue on any one particular topic.

Among a wide range of issues on cultural diversity, we focus on the practice of dialogue concerning articles 5, 12 and 16 of the Convention. Article 5 concerns the necessity to change all those cultural customs, practices and beliefs that are detrimental to the full enjoyment of women's human rights, article 12 contains the right to health and article 16 covers rights related to marriage and family relations. On these rights the most intensive discussion between the Committee and states parties took place, including on the (in)compatibility of certain (traditional) cultural practices and beliefs with the implementation of the Convention. Not coincidentally, these include provisions of the Convention with a large number of reservations by states.¹⁰⁰

States' responses to the Committee's interpretations of cultural diversity issues can broadly be categorised into three groups. First, states may accept the Committee's interpretations and recommendations (Section i below). Second, states may also reject the Committee's interpretations and recommendations, and put their own interpretation forward (Section ii). The state justifies its actions in an attempt to convince the Committee. Finally, states may ignore their non-compliance and avoid a dialogue on the issue (Section iii). This generally means that the state rejects the Committee's interpretations and recommendations, but does not (consider it necessary to) defend its actions or policies.

i Accepting the Committee's Interpretation and Recommendations

When considering the combined fifth and sixth periodic report of Kenya (2007), the Committee commented on '...the persistence of adverse cultural norms, practices and traditions as well as patriarchal attitudes and deep-rooted stereotypes regarding the roles,

⁹⁸ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Bangladesh' CEDAW/C/BGD/CO/7 (21 March 2011) para 27

⁹⁹ Ibid, para 39-40

¹⁰⁰ On reservations and cultural diversity, see further Yvonne Donders, 'Cultural Pluralism in International Human Rights Law: The Role of Reservations' in A Vrdoljak (ed), The Cultural Dimension of Human Rights (Oxford University Press, 2013) 205.

responsibilities and identities of women and men in all spheres of life'.¹⁰¹ It considered the cultural norms, practices and traditions obstacles to implementation of the Convention, and requested the state party '...to view its cultures as dynamic aspects of the country's life and social fabric and as subject, therefore, to change'.¹⁰² In its seventh periodic report, Kenya conceded that 'one of the biggest challenges to women's equality with men on matters concerning marriage and the family is cultural construction of women's roles vis-à-vis that of men, cultural attitudes and belief about women and their traditional roles, which lead to women's subjugation and, in many cases, retrogressive cultural practices',¹⁰³ and submitted that measures were being taken for modification of social and cultural patterns of conduct.¹⁰⁴ In the subsequent Concluding Observations, the Committee, 'while noting some efforts made by the state party', reiterated its concerns.¹⁰⁵

In the dialogue with Bangladesh, the Committee expressed concern that 'strong stereotypical attitudes persist with respect to the roles and responsibilities of women in the family and society, negatively affecting women's enjoyment of their rights and impeding the full implementation of the Convention'.¹⁰⁶ Bangladesh reported that it had been implementing 'programs that include awareness raising activities to change stereotype attitude and norms about the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and society'¹⁰⁷ and carried out 'activities as measures to address sex roles and stereotyping towards eliminating prejudices and biases'.¹⁰⁸ In the Concluding Observations, the Committee recognised the state party's efforts to promote changes in the stereotypical roles of women, but nevertheless, expressed its remaining concern.¹⁰⁹

¹⁰¹ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kenya' CEDAW/C/KEN/CO/6 (15 August 2007) para 21.

¹⁰² Ibid, para 22

¹⁰³ CEDAW, 'Seventh periodic report of Kenya', CEDAW/C/KEN/7 (24 March 2010) para 265.

¹⁰⁴ Ibid., paras 74-96.

¹⁰⁵ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kenya' CEDAW/C/KEN/CO/7 (5 April 2011) para 17.

¹⁰⁶ CEDAW, 'Concluding Comments of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Bangladesh' A/59/38 Part II (23 July 2004), para 246.

¹⁰⁷ CEDAW, 'Combined sixth and seventh periodic report of Bangladesh', CEDAW/C/BGD/6-7 (24 March 2010), para 110.

¹⁰⁸ Ibid., para 232.

¹⁰⁹ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Bangladesh' CEDAW/C/BGD/CO/7 (21 March 2011) para 17.

In such situations, where the state party agrees and accepts (or pays lip service to) the Committee's recommendations, the 'interaction' usually follows some general format of pre-established lines. The Committee's recommendations to the state party are quite broad and vague: the Committee 'urges' or 'calls upon' the state party to 'strengthen its efforts', or to 'accelerate efforts', or to 'put in place a comprehensive strategy' to modify or eliminate harmful practices and stereotypes that discriminate against women. Usually such a strategy should include efforts to 'intensify cooperation with civil society organizations, including women's groups and community leaders, traditional and religious leaders, as well as the media' or to 'educate and raise awareness of this subject, targeting women and men at all level of society, including traditional leaders'. The Committee may also recommend States parties to 'use innovative measures to strengthen understanding of the equality of women and men', or 'to engage in pervasive, sustained and proactive efforts to combat and eliminate discriminatory cultural concepts'. The Committee does not specify these strategies, efforts or measures, it merely stipulates what they should accomplish.

In several cases, the state party accepted the Committee's concerns, but argued to face obstacles or resistance in addressing these concerns. For example, in the dialogue with Indonesia, the Committee expressed concerns about the persistence of entrenched patriarchal attitudes and stereotypes about the roles and responsibilities of women and men in the family and society. Indonesia, although sharing these concerns, argued that 'values and cultural practices, especially when framed in a justification stemming from narrow religious interpretations, are difficult to address', and observed that a common understanding, also among policy makers, is often difficult to achieve.¹¹⁰ An example is the practice of female genital mutilation (FGM). The Committee was concerned about the incidence of FGM in Indonesia, the reported medicalization of FGM, and the lack of legislation prohibiting or penalizing it.¹¹¹ Indonesia replied that 'efforts to eradicate female circumcision constitute an uphill challenge as the custom is still practiced widely and reinforced by entrenched beliefs and religious interpretations’,¹¹² while stressing that it ‘continuously supports the efforts to combat violence against women in all forms, including FGM’.¹¹³ In 2008 the influential Indonesian Ulema Council issued a fatwa to the effect that the abolition of female circumcision was against Sharia provisions. In light of that development, the state party issued a new regulation providing a set of safeguards for medical personnel in performing female circumcision. The state stressed, however, that ‘this regulation should not in any way be construed as encouraging or promoting the practice of female circumcision’.¹¹⁴ Indonesia justified its policy by referring to ‘the dynamic of the implementation of rights and freedoms of its citizens, particularly with regards to the freedom to practice their religion and beliefs in a democratic society’.¹¹⁵ Nevertheless, the Committee expressed its concern about the serious regression with regard to FGM, and in particular the state party’s authorisation of certain medical practitioners to conduct it. It urged Indonesia to withdraw the regulation authorizing female circumcision when performed by medical practitioners, to restore the ban on the practice of female circumcision, and to adopt robust legislation criminalising the practice.¹¹⁶

¹¹⁰ CEDAW, 'Combined sixth and seventh periodic reports of the Republic of Indonesia', CEDAW/C/IDN/6-7 (7 January 2011) para 31.

¹¹¹ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Indonesia' CEDAW/C/IDN/CO/5 (15 August 2007) para 20.

ii Justifying Different Interpretation and Implementation

States not always respond to the Committee in an accommodating manner. The Committee may also be confronted with a state party rejecting its interpretations, while explaining and justifying its own interpretation of certain provisions.

In the dialogue with South Africa, for instance, the Committee was concerned about the continuing recognition of customary and religious laws,¹¹⁷ and recommended the state to prepare a uniform family code in conformity with the Convention, with the ¹¹² CEDAW, ‘Combined sixth and seventh periodic reports of the Republic of Indonesia’, CEDAW/C/IDN/6-7 (7 January 2011) para 131.

¹¹³ CEDAW, ‘Responses to the list of issues and questions: Indonesia’ CEDAW/C/IDN/Q/6-7/Add.1 (19 January 2012) para 35.

¹¹⁴ CEDAW, ‘Responses to the list of issues and questions: Indonesia’ CEDAW/C/IDN/Q/6-7/Add.1 (19 January 2012) para 36.

¹¹⁵ Ibid, para 37.

¹¹⁶ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Indonesia’ CEDAW/C/IDN/CO/6-7 (7 August 2012) para 22.

¹¹⁷ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Comments of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: South Africa’ A/53/38/Rev.1 (SUPP) (1 January 1998) para 117.

aim of abolishing (among others) polygamy.¹¹⁸ In its periodic report, South Africa replied that it would retain ‘...the combination of marital regimes (..) which include civil, customary and religious laws’.¹¹⁹ It explained that the Constitution recognises the protection of customary laws and institutions, which ‘automatically allows for polygamy because it is a customary practice’.¹²⁰ Accordingly, the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act recognises customary marriages, including polygamy, as ‘inspired by the dignity and equality rights entrenched in the Constitution and normative value system it establishes and necessitated by the country’s international treaty obligations’.¹²¹ South Africa considers the proprietary rights of women in customary marriages sufficiently protected, since the Act provides that ‘if a husband in a customary marriage wants to marry a second or subsequent wife, he must apply to the High Court for the division of the estate and submit a contract that will govern the new proprietary regime’.¹²² The state party further stated in its periodic report that for women (already) living in polygamous marriages ‘their livelihood would be threatened if polygamy was not recognized’.¹²³ Nevertheless, in its Concluding Observations, the Committee remained concerned that the state party upheld customary and religious laws and civil, customary and religious marital regimes that discriminate against women in the field of marriage and family relations, including polygamy¹²⁴ and – again – urged South Africa to adopt a unified family law in conformity with the Convention, with the aim of abolishing (among others) polygamy.¹²⁵

In the dialogue with Tunisia, the Committee asked to provide information on steps taken to ensure equality between women and men in matters of personal status, among others regarding dowry (Article 16 of the Convention).¹²⁶ Tunisia explained that ¹¹⁸ Ibid, para 118.

¹¹⁹ CEDAW, ‘Combined second, third and fourth periodic report of South Africa’, CEDAW/C/ZAF/2-4 (24 March 2010) para 16.1

¹²⁰ CEDAW, ‘Responses to the list of issues and questions: South Africa’ CEDAW/C/ZAF/Q/4/Add.1 (10 January 2011) para 36-37

¹²¹ Ibid, para 49

¹²² CEDAW, ‘Combined second, third and fourth periodic report of South Africa’, CEDAW/C/ZAF/2-4 (24 March 2010) para 16.7

¹²³ Ibid, para 16.8 (textbox 31: Polygamy and Women’s Rights)

¹²⁴ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: South Africa’ CEDAW/C/ZAF/CO/4 (5 April 2011) para 41

¹²⁵ Ibid, para 42

¹²⁶ CEDAW, ‘List of issues and questions: Tunisia’ CEDAW/C/TUN/Q/6 (29 March 2010) para 31

in the case of dowries, article 3 of the Personal Status Code states that ‘marriage shall be constituted only with the consent of both spouses. The presence of two reputable witnesses and the payment of a dowry for the bride are also conditions for the validity of the marriage’. ‘The dowry in this context has been reduced to a symbolic sum of one dinar (approximately 0.7 US dollars), and is therefore not discriminatory’.¹²⁷ In its Concluding Observations, the Committee did not accommodate such ‘symbolic dowry’: ‘While noting the efforts of the State party to reduce the value of the dowry to one dinar, the Committee is concerned that it remains a condition for the validity of the marriage’.¹²⁸ The Committee urged Tunisia to amend without delay discriminatory provisions or regulations relating to dowry.¹²⁹

The dialogue between the United Arab Emirates (UAE) and the Committee dealt among other things with equality between women and men in respect to inheritance. The UAE submitted in their report to CEDAW that ‘the Personal Status Act includes provisions governing questions of (..) inheritance. The sharia is the basic source for the provisions of the Act, inasmuch as it relates to matters clearly spelled out by the religion concerning which no debate is permissible’.¹³⁰ It further explained that ‘with respect to the distribution of inheritance, the provisions of the Islamic sharia are the principle reference’.¹³¹ Acknowledging that different shares are allocated to male and female inheritors, it argued that gender was not the dictating factor, but the financial burden which in accordance with the sharia is placed on the inheritor to fulfil the responsibilities towards others.¹³² The UAE further defended this practice, arguing that the differentiation does not lead to any wrong or unfairness towards the female, as follows: ‘...it is a man’s responsibility to support the female, his wife and his children, whereas a female inheritor has in her brother someone who must support her and her children, she receives less than her brother, who receives twice as much as she does, but

¹²⁷ CEDAW, ‘Responses to the list of issues and questions: Tunisia’ CEDAW/C/TUN/Q/6/Add.1 (18 August 2010) para 366

¹²⁸ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Tunisia’ CEDAW/C/TUN/CO/6 (4 November 2010) para 60

¹²⁹ Ibid, para 61

¹³⁰ CEDAW, ‘Initial periodic report of United Arab Emirates’, CEDAW/C/ARE/1 (17 September 2008), p. 58

¹³¹ CEDAW, ‘Responses to the list of issues and questions: United Arab Emirates’ CEDAW/C/ARE/Q/1/Add.1 (19 October 2009), answer to question no. 29

¹³² Ibid.

is more fortunate in respect of the inheritance because she is not obliged to support anyone else: that money is hers alone and is intended to provide a form of insurance for her'.¹³³ In the Concluding Observations, the Committee, nevertheless noted with concern that the legal provisions relating to personal status, including inheritance, in particular under the Personal Status Act, do not provide for equal rights of women and men. It called upon the UAE to introduce legislative reforms to provide women with equal rights in the field of inheritance.¹³⁴

iii Rejecting the Committee's Interpretation and Recommendations

Some states parties expressly avoid a dialogue on a particular subject by ignoring the Committee's questions or recommendations on a certain subject. It thereby implicitly rejects the Committee's interpretation of certain provisions. This 'tactic' can be recognised for example in situations where the state party's underlying 'paradigm' or 'worldview' is fundamentally different from that of the Committee, and the state party apparently does not believe that a dialogue can bridge this.

An example of this can be found in the dialogue between the Committee and Kuwait concerning the minimum age of marriage. After the Committee urged Kuwait to raise the minimum age of marriage for women and men to 18 years,¹³⁵ it replied that 'the official registration or certification of a marriage is prohibited if the girl is under 15 years of age and the young man is under 17 years of age at the time of registration',¹³⁶ thus ignoring the Committee's recommendation, and maintaining its own position. In the list of issues and questions in another round of reporting, the Committee asked Kuwait whether it was taking steps to bring discriminatory provisions contained in its Personal Status Act into conformity with the Convention¹³⁷ including the raising of the minimum age of marriage for women and men from 15 and 17 years to 18 years, 'as ¹³³ Ibid.

¹³⁴ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: United Arab Emirates' CEDAW/C/ARE/CO/1 (5 February 2010) para 48

¹³⁵ CEDAW, 'Concluding Comments of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kuwait' A/59/38 Part I (18 March 2004) para 67

¹³⁶ CEDAW, 'Combined third and fourth periodic report of Kuwait', CEDAW/C/KWT/3-4 (12 August 2010) para 110

¹³⁷ CEDAW, 'List of issues and questions: Kuwait' CEDAW/C/KWT/Q/3-4 (8 March 2011) para 29

recommended by the Committee'.¹³⁸ Kuwait's short reply was that 'matters relating to personal status, marriage, divorce and inheritance are governed by Islamic law, as clarified in the combined third and fourth report of the State of Kuwait'¹³⁹ The Committee, absent any explanation or justification by the state party, again expressed its concern about the absence of information on any steps taken by the State party to raise the minimum age of marriage for women and men to 18¹⁴⁰ and reiterated its previous recommendations.¹⁴¹

The Committee has occasionally tried to resolve such a deadlock, in particular regarding countries with an Islamic background, by pointing at countries with a similar background. For example, in the Concluding Observations on Kuwait, the Committee urged the state party to adopt specific legislation, 'seeking inspiration from other countries with similar cultural specificities which have taken steps in this regard',¹⁴² however, without specifying which countries could serve this purpose.

The recommendations in the state reporting procedure, unlike those in the individual communications procedure, do not deal with specific provisions and do not conclude violations. Consequently, Concluding Observations are more vague with regard to the content of the norms.

C Individual Communications Procedure ('Views')

In the individual communications procedure, the Committee, through concrete dispute resolution, gives abstract rights a concrete meaning, while striking a balance between the universal application of human rights and the reality of their implementation in diverse cultural contexts. This section discusses several individual complaints—in terms of content and process—where cultural diversity played a role in order to show what role the individual communications procedure plays in the interaction between the ¹³⁸ Ibid, para 31

¹³⁹ CEDAW, 'Responses to the list of issues and questions: Kuwait' CEDAW/C/KWT/Q/3-4/Add.1 (9 May 2011) para 82

¹⁴⁰ CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kuwait' CEDAW/C/KWT/CO/3-4 (8 November 2011) para 50

¹⁴¹ Ibid, para 51

¹⁴² Ibid, para 31. The Committee does not specify which other countries.

CEDAW and the state party. From the Committee jurisprudence,¹⁴³ the cases selected for review are those where culture functioned as an underlying cause of discrimination, or was considered discriminatory in itself.¹⁴⁴

In all selected cases Article 5, containing the elimination of prejudices, stereotypes and traditional attitudes that are discriminatory towards women, was invoked.¹⁴⁵ The cases concern diverse contexts. For example, in a rape case against the Philippines, the domestic court's decision was found to be grounded in gender-based myths and misconceptions about rape and rape victims in violation of Article 5. The Committee in its Views stressed that 'stereotyping affects women's right to a fair and just trial'.¹⁴⁶ The Committee came to similar conclusions in a domestic violence case against Bulgaria, where it not only stressed that stereotyping affects women's right to a fair trial, but also stated that 'traditional attitudes by which women are regarded as subordinate to men contribute to violence against them'.¹⁴⁷ It considered that the (domestic) courts interpreted domestic violence in a too stereotyped and overly narrow way.¹⁴⁸ In another domestic violence case against Hungary, the Committee noted that the facts of the communication reflected earlier observations in the state party's periodic report about attitudes towards women in the country as a whole. Recalling that at that time it was concerned about the 'persistence of entrenched traditional stereotypes regarding the role and responsibilities of women and men in the family',¹⁴⁹ the

¹⁴³ OHCHR website, < <http://www2.ohchr.org/english/law/jurisprudence.htm>>

¹⁴⁴ Thus, not discussed are the two cases of intersectional discrimination, where discrimination against women is linked with other (cultural) factors that affect (inclusion and participation of) women, such as race, ethnicity, religion or belief, sexual orientation, etc. In Cecilia Kell v. Canada (Comm. No. 19/2008), the Committee found that the author was a victim of intersectional discrimination based on her status as 'an aboriginal woman victim of domestic violence' (para 10.2). The Committee recommended that Canada compensate the author, and recommended recruiting and training more aboriginal women to provide legal aid to women from their communities, and reviewing the legal aid system to ensure aboriginal women who are victims of domestic violence have effective access to justice. In Maria de Lourdes da Silva Pimentel v. Brazil (Comm. No. 17/2008), the Committee concluded that the author was discriminated against, not only on the basis of her sex, but also on the basis of her status as a woman of African descent and her socio-economic background.. The Committee recommended to 'provide 'appropriate reparation', to the author, and to 'ensure women's right to safe motherhood and affordable access for all women to adequate emergency obstetric care' (Comm. No. 17/2008, para 8).

¹⁴⁵ For an analysis on Article 5 ICEDAW see Holtmaat (2012): "Article 5" (CEDAW), In M.A Freeman, C. Chinkin and B. Rudloff. CEDAW Commentary. Oxford University Press, 141-167

¹⁴⁶ Karen Tayag Vertido v Philippines (Communication No. 18/2008) para 8.4.

¹⁴⁷ Ms. V.K. v Bulgaria (Communication No. 20/2008) para 9.11.

¹⁴⁸ Ibid, para 9.12.

¹⁴⁹ Ms. A.T. v Hungary, para 9.4

Committee concluded a violation, and recommended the State party to ‘implement expeditiously and without delay the Committee’s concluding comments of August 2002 on the combined fourth and fifth periodic report of Hungary in respect of violence against women and girls’.¹⁵⁰

As were in the cases of state reporting procedures, states responded differently to the allegations concerning prejudices, stereotypes and traditional attitudes. Hungary, for instance, admitted that it had failed to comply with its obligations.¹⁵¹ Bulgaria, however, ignored¹⁵² and Turkey denied¹⁵³ a link between the facts and the existence of certain stereotypes or cultural patterns. In all these cases, the Committee found that the state party had failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 5. Its recommendations to the state party always included specific measures concerning the author of the communication, usually in the form of appropriate reparation, including adequate compensation.¹⁵⁴ The Committee also added recommendations on measures of a more general character, which in case of Article 5 violations are measures to modify cultural patterns and stereotypes, such as providing regular, appropriate and/or mandatory training on the Convention, its Optional Protocol and its general recommendations for

¹⁵⁰ Ibid, para 9.6

¹⁵¹ Ms. A.T. v Hungary, para 5.7: ‘Having realized that the system of remedies against domestic violence is incomplete in Hungarian law and that the effectiveness of the existing procedures is not sufficient, the State party states that it has instituted a comprehensive action programme against domestic violence in 2003. (...)These actions include: (...) requesting the judiciary to organize training for judges and to find a way to ensure that cases relating to violence within the family are given priority; and launching a nationwide campaign to address indifference to violence within the family and the perception of domestic violence as a private matter and to raise awareness of State, municipal and social organs and journalists’; Ms. A.T. v Hungary, para 7.3-7.4: ‘The State party admits that the experience of the Office and the information it has shows that domestic violence cases as such do not enjoy high priority in court proceedings. (...) it is conceded that the legal and institutional system in Hungary is not ready yet to ensure the internationally expected, coordinated, comprehensive and effective protection and support for the victims of domestic violence’ (emphasis added by authors).

¹⁵² Ms. V.K. v Bulgaria; Karen Tayag Vertido v Philippines.

¹⁵³ R.K.B. v Turkey, para 4.3: ‘The State party also submits that the claim of a violation of article 5, paragraph (a), of the Convention is incompatible with the provisions of the Convention, manifestly ill-founded and not sufficiently substantiated, as the author does not refer to any social and cultural pattern that the State party would have failed to take appropriate measures to modify. Therefore, there is no clear link between the author’s dismissal and a social and cultural pattern’; T.P.F. v Turkey, para 6.8: ‘Likewise, it would not be possible to link the fact that access to a therapeutic abortion was denied to the alleged existence of a certain stereotype against women’ (emphasis added by authors).

¹⁵⁴ Ms. A.T. v Hungary (Communication No. 2/2003) para 9.6; Ms. V.K. v Bulgaria (Communication No. 20/2008) para 9.16(a); Karen Tayag Vertido v Philippines (Communication No. 18/2008) para 8.9(a); R.K.B. v Turkey (Communication No. 28/2010) para 8.10(a) judges, lawyers, law enforcement personnel and/or medical personnel in a gender-sensitive manner.¹⁵⁵

The above shows that in these cases cultural (diversity) arguments are not accepted by the Committee as a justification for perpetuating inequality and the infringement of women's human rights. In fact, it is the other way around: the Committee considers cultures as dynamic, and subject to change. Actors (judges, lawyers, law enforcement personnel, medical personnel, etc.) should be informed and trained by the state in order to ensure that their decision-making is in line with universal norms.

D Constructive Dialogue?

In the introductory paragraphs of its Concluding Observations, the Committee usually notes that it appreciates the 'constructive dialogue' that took place between the delegation and the members of the Committee.¹⁵⁶ How constructive are these dialogues between Committee and states parties really? Arguably, the interaction between Committee and states parties falls short of deserving the label 'constructive dialogue'. To call it a 'dialogue', there should be more exchange of ideas or opinions. To call it 'constructive', there needs to be more argumentation and motivation.

¹⁵⁵ Specifically, the Committee made (among others) the following recommendations to the State parties: 'Provide for appropriate and regular training on the Convention, its Optional Protocol and its general recommendations for judges, lawyers and law enforcement personnel in a gender-sensitive manner, so as to ensure that stereotypical prejudices and values do not affect decision-making' (R.K.B. v Turkey, para 8.10(b)(ii)); 'Provide mandatory training for judges, lawyers and law enforcement personnel on the application of the Law on Protection against Domestic Violence, including on the definition of domestic violence and on gender stereotypes, as well as appropriate training on the Convention, its Optional Protocol and the Committee's general recommendations, in particular general recommendation No. 19' (Ms. V.K. v Bulgaria, para 9.16(b)(iv)); 'Ensure that all legal procedures in cases involving crimes of rape and other sexual offences are impartial and fair, and not affected by prejudices or stereotypical gender notions. (...) Concrete measures include: (...) Appropriate training for judges, lawyers, law enforcement officers and medical personnel in understanding crimes of rape and other sexual offences in a gender-sensitive manner so as to avoid revictimization of women having reported rape cases and to ensure that personal mores and values do not affect decision-making' (Karen Tayag Vertido v Philippines, para 8.9(b)).

¹⁵⁶ The CEDAW uses this term mainly in direct relation to the meeting with the state party in Geneva. For this chapter, however, we consider the whole process of state reporting, including the submission of state periodic reports, the preparation by the Committee of lists of issues and questions, the written replies by states parties, as well as the meeting between the Committee and states parties, as being part of the constructive dialogue.

Taking a closer look at the reporting procedure reveals that the interaction does not really go both ways. The state, in its periodic report, written replies to the list of issues and questions, and during the open sessions, is afforded considerable opportunity to explain its (culture-specific) views on the implementation of the Convention. Nevertheless, what seems to be missing is discussion. The Committee sometimes ‘notes’ or ‘welcomes’ measures taken by the state, but other than that the Committee does not show much responsiveness to the explanations or input from the state. The Committee time and again reiterates its concerns and recommendations, no matter what efforts or measures the state party has employed. There is not much motivation or reasoning behind the Committee’s observations and recommendations to the state party, or at least these are not explicitly mentioned. For example, in the discussed example of ‘symbolic dowry’ in the dialogue with Tunisia, the Committee only observed, very briefly: ‘while noting the efforts of the State party to reduce the value of the dowry to one dinar, the Committee is concerned that it remains a condition for the validity of the marriage’.¹⁵⁷

Presumably, the Committee is of the opinion that even a purely symbolic dowry condones the underlying cultural beliefs and attitudes, but it does not say so. In a constructive dialogue, should the Committee not explicitly substantiate its decision and explain its reasoning and motivation to the state party? It may be self-evident to the Committee, but the state party may genuinely believe that lowering the amount of the dowry (and thus the barrier to equality) while maintaining the dowry as a tradition or folklore is the optimal implementation of its international obligations, bearing in mind the (local) circumstances.

Another case in point is the example of FGM in Indonesia discussed above. The Committee urged the state party to withdraw the regulation and restore the circular letter, thereby ignoring explanations of the state party that it supports efforts to combat FGM, and that the regulation was adopted in light of the fatwa, with a view to preventing parents from opting for illegal and often more harmful FGM by traditional medical practitioners. The Committee could be more constructive in this situation. It is understandable that the Committee does not accept such a deviation from the state’s international obligations, in fact, it is a clear violation of the Convention. But, the

¹⁵⁷ CEDAW, ‘Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Tunisia’ CEDAW/C/TUN/CO/6 (4 November 2010) para 60

Committee could enhance the acceptability of its decision by responding to the state party's struggles and explanations. It could well be that following up on the Committee's recommendations may lead to a rise in female circumcisions by (non-medical) traditional practitioners, performing more harmful forms of circumcision. Bearing in mind these considerations and (local) circumstances, is withdrawing the regulation and restoring the circular letter still in the best interests of women? The Committee could be more responsive towards states' argumentation, and be more constructive through sharing its motivations and reasoning in more detail.

Another point is that the Committee is not very specific in its recommendations. Recommendations such as 'to put in place a comprehensive strategy',¹⁵⁸ 'to educate and raise awareness',¹⁵⁹ or 'to address' certain practices¹⁶⁰ are rather broad and vague. Such measures lack clear indicators and benchmarks. In fact, the Committee leaves the formulation of indicators and benchmarks to the state, making recommendations such as to 'undertake an assessment of the impact of those measures in order to identify shortcomings, and improve them accordingly in a clear timeframe'.¹⁶¹ Even though the Committee has a subsidiary role, leaving the final choice of measures of implementation to the states parties, it could aim for more concrete and measurable recommendations. This would allow the Committee to monitor progress between reporting cycles and it

¹⁵⁸ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Congo' CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6 (22 March 2012) para 22(a); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: South Africa' CEDAW/C/ZAF/CO/4 (5 April 2011) para 21(a); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Mexico' CEDAW/C/MEX/CO/7-8 (7 August 2012) para 35(c); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Egypt' CEDAW/C/EGY/CO/7 (3 February 2010) para 22

¹⁵⁹ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Congo' CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6 (22 March 2012) para 22(a); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Kenya' CEDAW/C/KEN/CO/7 (5 April 2011) para 18(a); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Singapore' CEDAW/C/SGP/CO/4/Rev.1 (10 August 2011) para 22(a); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Côte d'Ivoire' CEDAW/C/CIV/CO/1-3 (8 November 2011) para 27(a)

¹⁶⁰ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Mexico' CEDAW/C/MEX/CO/7-8 (7 August 2012) para 35(b); CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: The Netherlands' CEDAW/C/NLD/CO/5 (5 February 2010) para 11; CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Jamaica' CEDAW/C/JAM/CO/6-7 (7 August 2012) para 20; CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Norway' CEDAW/C/NOR/CO/8 (22 March 2012) para 36(d) would also contribute to a better understanding and thereby acceptability of the recommendations.

¹⁶¹ See, eg, CEDAW, 'Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women: Congo' CEDAW/C/COG/CO/6 (22 March 2012) para 22(c)

Often it is just as important to read what is not incorporated in the Concluding Observations. What does it mean when previous recommendations are not ‘reiterated’ in the new Concluding Observations? One can assume that these recommendations have been sufficiently implemented. One can also conclude that the issue is no longer ‘requiring the priority attention of the state party’. Again, this indicates a point for improvement in argumentation and reasoning on behalf of the Committee. In this regard, the relatively new¹⁶² follow-up mechanism is a significant step forward. Under the follow-up mechanism, the Committee requests the State party to provide, usually within two years, further information regarding some specific recommendations or ‘areas of concern’ identified by the Committee. In a letter by the Rapporteur for Follow-up on Concluding Observations, progress on each of these recommendations is examined and the Committee adopts an assessment on each one of them. A recommendation can be considered ‘(fully) implemented’, ‘partially implemented’, or ‘not implemented’. In its annual report to the General Assembly, the CEDAW reported that ‘the follow-up procedure is achieving its stated goal of acting as a tool of implementation of the Convention and more specifically the recommendations set out in selected concluding observations’. Moreover, ‘this procedure (..) enables the Committee to monitor progress achieved between reporting cycles’.¹⁶³ Although probably not feasible in terms of (financial) resources, it would be a considerable improvement if it were applied, not only to one or two selected ‘areas of concern’, but to all recommendations by the Committee.

V Concluding Remarks: Role of Dialogue in Mediating Cultural Diversity and Legal Certainty

The ICEDAW is no exception to the general fact that international human rights provisions are often formulated in rather broad and ambiguous language. This makes it possible for universal principles to be applied in diverse cultural contexts. At the same time, the vagueness of treaty terms increases the importance of the processes of interpreting treaty provisions and determining their scope and normative content, and such processes involve dialogues between states and the treaty bodies.

¹⁶² Implemented since 2010

¹⁶³ CEDAW Annual Report to GA, A/67/38 (2012), p. 43

This chapter aimed to illustrate to what extent the dialogue between states parties to the ICEDAW and its monitoring committee enables states parties to reiterate, revisit, or be challenged on the value of particular cultural norms and practices in relation to the implementation of the ICEDAW, and how this dialogue relates to the development of consensus and certainty over the meaning of the norms in this Convention. This chapter also addressed the question as to what extent this process of dialogue between the CEDAW and the states parties strengthens legal certainty in formal and substantive terms, in other words, in terms of clarity and predictability of the norms and procedures, as well as in terms of acceptability of these norms and procedures.

Our starting point was that legal certainty serves a purpose in relation to international human rights law. Clarity and determinacy provide states with a clear framework for action and individuals and communities with insight in their rights and the rights of others. At the same time, legal certainty should not be reduced to predictability alone. Certain flexibility is needed to be able to apply the norm in different specific contexts. Universal human rights norms should be flexible enough to be implementable in a large variety of situations without losing their universal validity. Treaty bodies have an important role to play in advancing legal certainty, both from a formal perspective (predictability) and a substantive perspective (acceptability).¹⁶⁴ This implies balancing predictability of the norms (through clear formulation, consistency and unity) with a certain flexibility to implement the norms in different contexts, as well as to argue as clearly and consistently as possible in order to be acceptable.

The analysis of the dialogue on cultural diversity issues between the CEDAW and states parties shows that the Committee does, generally speaking, not leave much room for cultural diversity in the implementation of the treaty provisions. The Committee seems not very open or receptive towards states' cultural (diversity) arguments concerning the implementation of the Convention. On the contrary, the Committee considers cultures as 'dynamic' and therefore, 'subject to change'. It is the culture that should change, not the interpretation of the (scope of the) norms or obligations of states parties.

¹⁶⁴ For the definition of formal and substantive legal certainty, see Section II-B above.

In the determination of the room for cultural diversity, the Committee mainly relies on its own understanding of the specific content of the norms, in which states parties play a very limited role. Others have already observed that the dialogue between treaty bodies and states parties often reflects the Committee's understanding of the specific content of rights, whereby states are pressed to explain practices.¹⁶⁵ The present analysis, especially in the context of the state reporting procedure,¹⁶⁶ supports this observation. It shows that the Committee's interpretation of the content of the rights hardly depends on an understanding resulting from the dialogue with states parties. The Committee rather follows its own, independent, understanding.

In the practice of CEDAW, limited constructive interaction with the states parties takes place. Other than (sometimes) 'noting' or 'welcoming' some efforts by the state party, the Committee and the state party do not fully engage in a two-way dialogue; the Committee for instance neither motivates its observations nor shares its reasoning. Arguably, this has implications for the acceptability of the procedure and its outcome, or what was called substantive legal certainty. While the Committee, to some extent, succeeds in contributing to formal legal certainty by creating predictability and commonality in its interpretation of treaty norms, the lack of a real dialogue implies that the interpretation of treaty norms by the Committee may not always be acceptable to states. It seems that the Committee mainly promotes formal legal certainty, even to the extent that it may be at the expense of substantive legal certainty. States who now demonstrate a willing and constructive attitude in the reporting procedure, and use the opportunity to explain their cultural beliefs and practices in relation to the CEDAW norms, may become frustrated by the lack of motivation on the side of the Committee. This could eventually cause States to refuse to engage in a dialogue.

In order to promote the acceptability of its work, the CEDAW should not only be more clear in its argumentation and open to dialogue, but it should also create more

¹⁶⁵ Douglas Lee Donoho, 'Autonomy, Self-Governance, and the Margin of Appreciation: Developing A Jurisprudence of Diversity within Universal Human Rights' (2001) 15 Emory International Law Review 391, 436

¹⁶⁶ But also in the individual communications procedure, the Committee opted for its own interpretation/understanding of article 5, and the obligations it imposes on States.

unity in its work. The different mechanisms—state reports and individual communications—should be better aligned. References to other cases or concluding observations could enhance consistency and could show the commonality in the application of the norms. The CEDAW does this regularly,¹⁶⁷ but not consistently. Likewise, the Committee could work on improving coherence and consistency between its own reporting format, based on a thematic categorisation, and the one used by states parties, who categorise their obligations and implementation measures along the articles of the Convention. At the same time, alignment is no guarantee for acceptability and convincingness, since the state situations are very different. It is therefore important to improve the dialogue – in particular its constructiveness – between the Committee and the states parties. This would in turn contribute to a proper balance between universality, diversity and legal certainty.

¹⁶⁷ Occasionally, the Committee refers in its individual communications to concerns expressed earlier in the Concluding Observations as part of the state's periodic reporting process. For example, as discussed above in A.T. v. Hungary, para 9.4. Sometimes, the Committee refers to the periodic reporting procedure in general, such as in the case of Karen Tayag Vertido v. Philippines, para 8.7. While the Committee in individual communications regularly refers to the state reporting procedure, the other way around is rare. In the selected case law, one example was found. In the Concluding Observations of Norway, the Committee urged the State party to 'adopt a legal definition of rape in the Penal Code (..), in line with the Committee's general recommendation No. 19, and the Vertido case' (Karen Tayag Vertido v. Philippines, para 24).