ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This dissertation would not have been completed without the financial and institutional support I have received from the Amsterdam School for Cultural Analysis, to which I am very grateful. As a PhD candidate at ASCA, I have had the chance to participate in numerous seminars, conferences, and events, and to gain knowledge and inspiration from wonderful colleagues and scholars. I want to thank all past and present ASCA members for creating such a wonderful and intellectually inspiring space. I feel utterly privileged and grateful to have been part of ASCA as a PhD candidate, and will proudly continue to ‘feel’ like an ASCA member wherever my academic pursuits take me in the future.

The development of this dissertation, and my academic and intellectual progress, would certainly not have been achieved without the expert guidance and unwavering support I have received from my supervisor, Christoph Lindner. I wish to express my deepest gratitude to Christoph Lindner for all the detailed feedback, professional advice and positive encouragement that he has offered me since I first met him in 2010. I also want to thank him for creating and sustaining the ASCA Cities Project, the intellectual platform which caught my attention as the right place to be at the time when I was considering doing a PhD, and of which I have had the privilege to be a member ever since. I am grateful to Christoph Lindner and the Cities Project also for providing me with opportunities to broaden the scope of my academic work and gain experience in teaching, publishing, and organizing conferences.

If the Cities Project was productive and fun for me, it was definitely thanks to the enthusiasm and intellect that Miriam Meissner and Judith Naeff brought along and shared with me. I want to thank Miriam and Judith from the bottom of my heart for all the positive energy they carried into our collective projects, and for the unconditional support and friendship that they offered me throughout the past five years. I also want to thank all the people who were present and actively engaged in the events organized by the Cities Project, and from whom I learned and benefited. For all the chats and conversations that continued over drinks following Cities seminars, reading groups and conferences, I want to thank, among others, Uzma Ansari, Alejandra Espinosa, Simone Kalkman, Tijmen Klous, Niall Martin, Anna Nikolaeva, and Daan Wesselmann.

In conducting this research project, I benefitted from the help and support of many colleagues and scholars. I want to thank Eloë Kingma and Jantine van Gogh, the indefatigable managing team of ASCA, without whose full support and help, and warm smiles, the process of doing a PhD at the University of Amsterdam would have certainly been more frustrating and less enjoyable. For their never ending encouragements and endorsements, I want to thank Patricia Pisters and Esther Peeren, the director and vice-director of ASCA. I also want to thank Robin Celikates, for kindly reading and commenting on a preliminary version of my chapter on cars, and Markus Stauff, for patiently listening to my initial thoughts on sports and offering me invaluable ideas and material to go further. I want to thank Lotte Tavecchio for the magnificent course she offered on advanced academic writing, which I had the opportunity to follow twice, and from which I have benefitted enormously. I also enjoyed and gained from the Presentation Skills course, to which I am grateful to Mabel Frumau. I am grateful to Papeita Hesselberth for inviting me to participate at Urban Ecologies seminar in Copenhagen, from which I took significant insights for the development of my project.

My thinking also benefited from the exchange with students in the courses that I had the chance to teach. My gratitude goes to Christoph, Judith, and Miriam, for giving me the chance to work with them in the summer course Amsterdam Creative City that we taught together in 2014 and 2015. For kindly inviting me to give guest lectures in their courses, I want to thank Lara Mazurski, Noa Roei, Marco de Waard, and Astrid van Weyenberg. I also want to thank Rebecca Lindner for offering me the opportunity to teach at Amsterdam University College, and for being such a wonderful co-teacher. I also want to thank Allard den Dulk, my co-teacher at AUC, for putting up with my hectic schedule at the final stages of the completion of my manuscript.

My gratitude also goes to the ASCA PhD community for their friendship, help and support, and for all the chats, conversations, coffee breaks, drinks, and gossip that truly gave character to my life as a PhD candidate. For reading and commenting on my PhD proposal in its initial stages, and for their continued friendship, I am particularly grateful to Adam Chambers, Walid Hourri, Blandine Joret, Aylin Kuryel, Asli Ozgen Tuncer, Birkan Tas, Ginaluca Turricchia, and Thijs Witty. I am also deeply grateful to Simon Ferdinand for his detailed proofreading and helpful comments on my writing in the later stages of my project, not least for his warm friendship. My gratitude also goes to Tijmen Klous, who proofread my final manuscript and helped me out with his extremely fast but meticulous and perfectionist editing. I also want to thank all the fellow PhD candidates with whom I have collaborated in organizing events, and all those with whom I have shared an office at PCHoofthuis and in the Mediastudies building, including, among others, Selcuk Balamir, Alex Brown, Flora Lysen, Christian Olesen, Nur Ozgenalp, Jeffrey Pijpers, Eva Sancho Rodriguez, Margaret Tali and Lucy van de Wiel.

My thinking has also benefited from the chats and conversations I have had with friends beyond ASCA. I want to thank Nasrin Tabatabai and Babak Afrassiabi, not only for their generosity, supports and friendship from the moment I moved to the Netherlands in 2008, but also for the very helpful conversation we held about Kiarostami's use of cars in one of the cafés in Witte de Withstraat in Rotterdam. I am grateful to my friend Aqil Bahra who brought my attention to the shopping scene in Sina Dadkhah's novella, 33rd Street, Yousefabad. To Peyman Amiri I am grateful not only for numerous ideas and objects that I took from conversing with him, but also, on a personal level, for the friendship that has evolved between us, for his being there for me at all times. I also want to thank Vida Gharehbaghi and Bita Gharehbaghi, my dear cousins in Tehran, who kindly helped me in getting hold of material for my study at various points during my stay in Amsterdam.

I am grateful to all friends and family members who helped me out in difficult times during my stay in Amsterdam. I want to thank my family in Iran for putting up with my absence at home, and for accepting, although unwittingly, the idiosyncrasies of doing a PhD in the humanities. I am especially grateful to my mother, Shahin Gharehbaghi, my brother, Hesam Dibazar, and my uncle, Parviz Gharabaghy, for coming all the way from Iran and taking good care of me at the time when I had to undergo a surgery during the first year of my PhD. I want to thank all the friends and colleagues who sent me flowers or came to visit me at the hospital in those difficult times, including, among many others whose names I have already mentioned, Kevin Bray, Stephen Clark, Jeff Hoekwater, Simone Munao, Lena Rasmussen, and Cecilie Skielboe. I want to particularly thank Burcin Tuncer, whose visit to the hospital, along with Asli, and the discussion he was trying to hold with my mother I greatly appreciated but never got the opportunity to express to him in his short lifetime. My deepest gratitude also goes to Edoardo Saba, without whose practical help and mental support I simply would not have been able to undergo the surgery and survive its distress. I also want to thank Maloe and Fien Klein, for accompanying Judith on one of her visits to the hospital, and for the beautiful painting that Maloe made for me.

Finally, I want to thank George Mortimer for accepting all the oddities of living with a PhD researcher, and for simply making my life happier.
