Towards a Critical Trauma Studies: A Response to Felix Lang

Matthies-Boon, E.A.V.

Published in:
Middle East - Topics and Arguments

DOI:
10.17192/meta.2018.11.7812

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: https://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.
In this response, I agree with Felix Lang about the need to problematize trauma studies’ prevalent and underlying assumptions. However, I suggest that we should go a step further, namely towards a phenomenological account of trauma rooted in Frankfurt School of critical theory. Such an approach enables us to pay attention to the political power dynamics within which trauma studies is enmeshed, and argue against the reification and objectification of trauma. It also allows for an intersubjective (re)interpretation of trauma that explicitly grounds the experiences of trauma in social and political contexts.

First, of all, let me just say that I agree with much of what Felix Lang has written. And so, this anti-thesis is not so much an anti-thesis as a call to take his essay a few steps further. Or dare I say, it is an attempt to move it towards a self-reflexive political radicalization of trauma studies. By that, I mean the deliberate attempt to question (and thereby change) the social structures and political values of trauma studies as well as the realities that trauma studies engage with. I argue that those of us working within trauma studies (however loosely defined) should undertake a self-reflexive examination of the political biases of our knowledge production and explicitly aim towards a critical theoretical interpretation of our practices. I believe that by drawing inspiration from Frankfurt School of critical theory, we can 1) take a stance against the reification and objectification of trauma, 2) pay attention to the political power dynamics within which trauma studies is enmeshed, and 3) argue for an intersubjective (re)interpretation of trauma that explicitly links the self to the social and political world(s). Frankfurt School of critical theory, in its varied forms, has above all taught us that theoretical knowledge production and socio-political practices are inherently intertwined. And the aim of critical theory is to offer a (never-ending and self-reflexive) critique of the... established political status quo—in which individual, social and political realms are interconnected—with the explicit aim of emancipation and liberation from divergent modes of alienation.

In terms of trauma studies, this means first of all recognizing that trauma as such is not a neutral, objective diagnostic concept, but rather that the very notion of trauma may entail an objectification and reification of divergent experiences and expressions. As Felix Lang and others before him (see Bracken; Craps; Hacking; Young) have argued, the concept of trauma—commonly linked to PTSD—is not politically neutral but a direct result of a particular political struggle—namely the Vietnam War veterans’ lobby—which risks projecting onto history and others a universalist conception of trauma that potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expression. In doing so, and through its diagnostic categories, trauma studies validate and invalidate certain experiences of trauma. Not only that, but the diagnostic and medicalizing tendency in much of the trauma studies literature also potentially erases differences of experience and expresof radical unsafety—from which therapeutic safety cannot be guaranteed. CTS thus urges us to re-evaluate the particularly Westocentric underpinnings of the dominant conception of trauma, and the hierarchies of suffering and alienation it imposes.

Felix Lang is correct to note there is a flattening of trauma, in the sense that much of the mainstream literature on trauma regards these traumatic experiences (from Rwanda to Syria) to be the same as it pays scant attention to the vastly different social, cultural, political contexts and meaning-making practices. Yet, whilst there is a flattening, there is also a hierarchization of trauma that exposes its own political biases. For instance, much of the existing trauma studies literature takes the Holocaust as being the most unique and ultimate pinnacle of trauma. This is not to take away from the gravity of the Holocaust and the systematic destruction of human life as such, but when we consider the relative absence of serious considerations of the slave trade or indeed the Nakba (Sayigh) in the theoretical trauma studies literature—as well as the fact that many of the international centers of trauma expertise are located in Israel (rather than say Gaza or the West Bank)—one cannot help but wonder about the political orientations and purposes of trauma studies knowledge production itself. The question here is: who has a political voice? Whose voice is articulated and whose voice is heard, and by whom? What does it mean to have a political voice, and is the witnessing that trauma studies calls us to do always emancipatory (Caruth)? Or can it itself lead to further repression and silencing through in- and out-group creations?

It is indeed time that we recognize the power dynamics at play within trauma studies itself: trauma is not a neutral construct, but one whose knowledge production is tied up with social, economic, and political power (like other fields of scholarship). One good starting point is, I argue, to create links between trauma studies and the critical political theory of the Frankfurt School, thereby seeking to avoid the tendency of reification of trauma as a neutral category and highlighting its distinctly political manifestations and implications. Linking trauma more closely to critical theory enables us to explore the dimensions of alienation, reification, and political power imbalances and injustices in varied forms. For instance, in the case of Egypt, directly linking the existential traumatic experiences of activists in post-revolutionary Egypt with Jurgen Habermas’s colonization of the lifeworld enabled an elucidation of the political (counter-revolutionary and strategic) purposes behind the emotional and physical destruction, social atomization, and tactics of polarization and dehumanization experienced by activists (Matthies-Boon and Head). Whilst, vice versa, phenomenological analyses of existentially traumatic experiences can lead to a clarification as to how the destruction of a person’s or a group’s social and political world contributes to particular processes of alienation and political (de) mobilization—and are thus important for our critical theoretical social and political undertakings (Matthies-Boon). Critical theoretical conceptions of trauma allow us to link the phenomenological experiences of personal estrangement and distress to processes of political alienation and social destruction, thereby deepening our analysis. Hence, the study of trauma is a clear political act, but one that must be situated in a mode of never-ending self-reflexive radical critique—one that does not provide easy answers but in fact continuously raises radically uneasy questions.
Notes

1 Unfortunately, in the space of this response I do not have sufficient capacity to develop the more precise outlines of a Frankfurt School conception of trauma, but this is the subject of my forthcoming book Life, Death and Alienation: Counter-Revolutionary Trauma in Egypt.

2 Please note that with Frankfurt School critical theory I include the divergent thoughts and works of the different generations, including (but not limited to) Theodor Adorno, Max Horkheimer, Erich Fromm, Jürgen Habermas, Axel Honneth, and Nancy Fraser.

Works Cited

