A sincere and whole-hearted ‘thank you’ is definitely in place here to express my gratitude to a number of people who have been very supportive to me in finishing this research project. As good things always come in three, first and foremost I need to thank in the same breath Giep, Bas and Annieck. They have been crucial in the years that I have spent on this research project. Giep Franzen introduced me to the world of advertising and brands, and has been a very inspiring person in this role. I have to admit that, at first, his experience and knowledge overwhelmed me, being a complete novice in the world of brands. Yet as I am gradually becoming able to really value and appreciate his immense ‘mental world of brands’, I feel very privileged that Giep has supported and guided me through the years and has given his approval to this thesis in his role as my promotor. Bas van den Putte has been invaluable in providing me with very detailed, constructive criticism and practical support in both conducting the research and reporting on it during the years that he was my co-promotor. Being a role-model scientist, he has the ability to see through big words and bold statements, and to question what is written from an apparent layman’s perspective. Apart from the fact that this truely improved my thesis, I take a lot of his experience and approach to scientific research with me as personal learnings. I must add to this that, apart from being inspiring and supportive supervisors, I have also very much appreciated Giep and Bas’ kind and interesting personalities: definitely pleasurable and good fun to work with. Annieck proved to be my backbone in the process of getting this piece of work over and done with. Her patience, support and encouragements have been a major driving force, in particular when finishing the thesis became an evening job after our move to the UK. It would have taken many more months had she not been as involved as she was, and I owe it to her to be as helpful, loving, and supportive as possible in her own journey to get her Ph.D. (and to make up for the lack of attention).

I have become a proud member of the SWOCC family over the years. A big ‘thank you’ to SWOCC, firstly for enabling me to conduct research thanks to their grant, and secondly for making me part of the unique mission to deliver independent, scientific research on commercial communication to our sponsors. On top of that, I found myself more and more addicted to the SWOCC spirit, which for me came down to sheer fun and laughter. In particular Daniëlle, Kim and Irene have made my days at the university unique and memorable. I owe you many thanks for that, but also for the many fruitful discussions on our research that we have had over the years. I was also kindly adopted by SWOCC’s neighbour family, ASCoR, which provided me with a platform to develop myself as a researcher, through courses, but most of all through the great discussions we had during our forthnightly Ph.D. club meetings. I feel very lucky to have worked amid such a great group of fellow students, I have had a great time with all of you.
For their contribution to the first stages of this research project, I want to thank Dirk Sikkel and Peter Neijens. Dirk for guiding me as co-promotor in the early days of the project, and Peter for helping me out with getting the project up and running in his role as SWOCC director and as stand-in, on-site supervisor in the physical absence of my promotors. Johan Hoogstraten was the one who actually got me to apply for the project. I am very happy that he thought of me when a fax with the research project vacancy got to his attention, and I truly appreciate the fact that, almost five years later, he was amongst those who approved my thesis for promotion. Many thanks also to Patti Valkenburg and Theo Verhallen for being so kind to work their way through this thesis as members of my promotion committee.

I can mention many more names of people that have been either influential, supportive, involved, or all of these. However, in finishing off I do need to thank by name Dirk-Jan den Boer for providing me with the means to conduct the second study, Edith Smit for providing support in her role as SWOCC director, Marjolein for being my perfect paranimf and good friend, and Eelco for being a great coder, paranimf and friend. Finally, I would very much like to thank my grandmother and parents, who I consider to be my sources of inquisitiveness.
