Though writing a PhD thesis is an essentially existentialist experience, I am very grateful to the people who helped me along the way.

My thesis supervisors Michael Ellman and Ruud Knaack gave me the freedom to choose my own research path. Ruud’s more ‘brainstormy’, and Michael’s more ‘down-to-earth’ character made their guidance on this path nicely ‘complementary’. Among the other people who gave constructive comments on different parts of this thesis I would like to single out Dirk Bezemer, Mars Cramer, Louise Grogan, Franc Klaassen, Jan Potters, Xander Tieman, and Jeromin Zettelmeyer. I also received useful comments from the various editors and anonymous referees of the journals in which the first six of the seven chapters of which this thesis consists previously appeared. Their publishers kindly gave me permission to reproduce the material here. Furthermore, helpful feedback was obtained from participants at the various national and international seminars and conferences where I presented my work. Elfie Bonke, Marian Duppen, and Robert Helmink were always available for secretarial support, and created ‘good vibes’ in the workplace. The latter is certainly also applicable to my roommate Albert van der Horst. Roel Beetsma, Saul Estrin, Harry Garretsen, Henk Jager, and Enrico Perotti kindly agreed to sit on my thesis reading and defense committee. Financial support was provided by the Chair of Transition Economics, Tinbergen Institute, University of Amsterdam, and Dutch Organization for Scientific Research.

Nicely taught courses of the Netherlands Network of Economics were a direct stimulus for chapters 1 and 2. The first chapter grew out of participation in a course on the political economy of transition, taught by Michael Ellman. It was previously published in Dutch in Economisch Statistische Berichten in February 1999 (Moers, 1999a). The second chapter grew out of participation in courses on coordination problems and new institutional economics, taught by Maarten Janssen and Sanjeev Goyal, and Jan Potters respectively. It was previously published in Dutch in Tijdschrift voor Politieke Ekonomie in May 2000 (Moers, 2000a).

Chapters 3 and 4 were started after first becoming aware of this then novel line of research through some World Bank papers. Chapter 3 was previously published in Dutch in...

Maandschrift Economie in February 1999 (Moers, 1999b), and an earlier version appeared as Tinbergen Institute Discussion Paper no. 98-126/2. Chapter 4 grew out of my Tinbergen Institute Discussion Paper no. 99-004/2 (Moers, 1999c). When its referees asked for re-estimations on the basis of an updated data set while I was lacking time, Louise Grogan (now at the Canadian International Labour Network and McMaster University, then at the Tinbergen Institute and University of Amsterdam too) joined me in revising the paper. The cooperation worked well, and I particularly enjoyed our largely coincidental meetings in ‘cool’ places such as St. Petersburg and Stockholm. This revised paper was previously published in Economic Systems in December 2001 (Grogan and Moers, 2001).

Robert Scharrenborg insisted that the enterprise panel of the Institute for the Economy in Transition (IET) in Moscow could prove useful for my research. This stimulated me to write chapter 5, which grew out of Tinbergen Institute Discussion Paper no. 99-077/2. It was previously published in the Journal for Institutional Innovation, Development and Transition in September 2000 (Moers, 2000b). In Moscow, he subsequently brought me into contact with Sergey Tsukhlo, the ‘father’ of IET’s enterprise panel, with whom the refinement and implementation of the survey instrument were worked out in a most agreeable way. My enterprise survey led to chapter 6, which grew out of Tinbergen Institute Discussion Paper no. 2000-026/2. It was previously published in Post-Communist Economies in September 2000 (Moers, 2000c), but has been extended with one section here. Anja Leikin helped with Russian, which gave me just the command of this language that I needed for arranging the enterprise survey.

A summer internship and subsequent consultancy at the World Bank formed the start of chapter 7. Paul Collier and Cathy Pattillo kindly gave me permission to use capital flight data that I constructed for them in these positions. Jenny Ligthart brought me in touch with Jeromin Zettelmeyer, who was working on similar issues at the International Monetary Fund (IMF). In turn, Jeromin invited me to the IMF as a visiting scholar, and gave advice on chapter 7. As an aside, without this sequence of events, I do not think I would have been on the IMF staff now, a wish I already held during my undergraduate studies.

‘All work is no good’. From the Tinbergen environment, I appreciated the interaction beyond work with in particular Hans, Paul, Pieter, Udo, and Xander. From other environments, in particular my father (and paranymp who defended his thesis in medicine in the exact same spot 40 years ago), mother, brother, sister, Annemarie, Anne-Martine, Barbera, Gera, Hans, Jan, Jarkko, Jeroen, Kirsten, Lois, Lou, Louis, Noud, Robbert, Rogér (my other paranymph, who listened most tirelessly to my boring thesis monologues), Roland and Wilma should know they have my love, and I take the occasion to express it here. The eating, drinking, squashing, discussing, clubbing, biking, swimming, joking, skating, traveling, snowboarding, living with you is what I most deeply cherish. I hope we will continue on this basis, in spite of the fact that moving to Washington, DC, physically separated me from most of you.

Needless to say (as we always say) that the people and organizations mentioned above are not implicated by any part of this thesis, which is my sole responsibility. Nevertheless: thanks a lot!
