ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

As is the case with most long-term research and writing projects, the one I embarked upon in order to produce this thesis has made innumerable twists and turns. It is not an exaggeration to say that this book would never have been completed had it not been for help, generosity and friendship of numerous individuals and institutions at various critical junctures.

I was steered towards the idea of studying illegal logging in East Kalimantan in the early 1999, thanks to conversations with Marti Mattikainen and Gordon Storey of the Berau Forest Management Project (BFMP). I owe them a great debt of gratitude for their support and encouragement in the early, often confusing, stages of identifying research issues.

The initial research ideas would never have turned into a fully-fledged project had it not been for the invaluable and extensive help of Mary Stockdale and Jon Corbett in Samarinda. The time I spent at their house, during which they patiently went through dozens of drafts of my proposed project, helped make it a “do-able” project and was the most critical formative period of this study. Their boundless hospitality, patience and enthusiasm taught me a great deal about the true meaning of friendship.

Once designed, the project would have been impossible to carry out without the support, both financial and institutional, from the Center for International Forestry Research (CIFOR) in Bogor as well as from BFMP. In particular, I would like to thank Brian Belcher and Lini Wollenberg for supporting the project concept and Patrice Levang for taking me under his wing during the implementation stage. I would also like to express my appreciation to Joyotee Smith for enabling me to work on subsequent consultancy assignments that added important building blocks to this thesis. My heartfelt thanks go to Christopher Barr and Patricia Shanley who made me feel at home in Bogor and whose unwavering support, hospitality and encouragement were invaluable in overcoming my numerous doubts and uncertainties about the writing phase. Without them, I would have never been able to be where I am today.

Successful application of the fieldwork on illegal logging in East Kalimantan was possible due to participation and cooperation of great many people in the area. In particular, I would like to thank my field assistants Iman, Ian and Sut whose assistance was crucial to building a network of contacts that helped open many doors which otherwise would have remained closed. It is to these (in the text anonymous) contacts that I would like to convey my deepest appreciation for their understanding of our cause and willingness to give us an insight into the inner workings of the timber business. In particular, I would like to thank Samson for his amazing patience and trust when I began showing up in his sawmill and asking all kinds of questions.

Negotiating numerous the ups and downs of the fieldwork and subsequent writing would also have been impossible without the warmth, patience and understanding of my closest companion Eva Salina. The time we spent in Berau and elsewhere were an important learning periods for both of us.
Placing the thesis project within the wider academic framework, I would like to express my deepest thanks to ASSR at the University of Amsterdam for its multifaceted support and for enabling me to be part of its stimulating learning environment. I would like to thank dr. Hans Sonneveld, José Komen, Teun Bijvoet, Anneke Dammers, Miriam May and others for their friendship and patience during the course of completing this study. I would also like to express my gratitude to the school, its staff and particularly to my promotors prof dr Frans Hüsken and prof dr Leontine Visser for keeping faith in me when my work in Indonesia was not going particularly well early on and for affording me freedom and flexibility in steering it toward a successful conclusion.

In the final stages of completing this thesis, I received invaluable editorial help from Hanneke Teunissen (KITLV), Pauline Broertjes (UvA), Yulia Siagian and Pak Yanto (both CIFOR). I would like to express my heartfelt thanks for their help with countless revisions, translations and modifications of the text. The fact that this thesis has eventually seen the light of the day in printed form is in large part due to my UvA colleague and a good friend Pepijn van de Port. During my absence in late 2002, he had guided this thesis through the winding path of university and administrative procedures and made it possible for me to defend it as scheduled. I will always be grateful for his immense help and friendship. Thanks Pepijn.

Finally, I would like to convey the warmest expression of gratitude to my family – my parents, Maria and Euzebiusz, and my sister Agnieszka. I would never have found my way to Indonesia without their instilling in me the wonder about faraway places and people and giving me the courage to follow it.
