Below, I acknowledge the people whose guidance, support and encouragement enabled me to complete the Ph.D. research that resulted in this book.

Supervisors and Advisors

My principal supervisor, Prof. Dr. Sjaak van der Geest, of the Medical Anthropology Unit of University of Amsterdam, guided me through the wilderness of Ph.D. research as a friend and philosopher. He was with me from the conception of this research to its present form, and helped me with the concepts and ideas necessary to proceed along the proper track. When Bangladesh was born in 1971, Prof. Sjaak was doing his first anthropological fieldwork in a remote Ghanaian village. It was my research that brought him to Bangladesh in the year 2000 after three decades of an illustrious career in anthropology. He travelled different parts of Bangladesh, including Chittagong, to see and talk with the people of the hospital where I did my research. Rakib, the car driver of BRAC, the organisation I work for, who took Prof. Sjaak to different parts of Dhaka, still asks me ‘How is your professor?’ He does not ask after Prof. Sjaak because he gave him bakshees (tip), which all visitors give, but because he asked him about his life. I learned from Prof. Sjaak how being anthropologist means being constantly curious about the people around you and at the same time remaining aware of their self-respect. I express my deep gratitude to him.

It was a great pleasure for me when Prof. Dr. Pieter Streefland, of the University of Amsterdam, the other supervisor used to stop me in the corridor of the Spinhuis, the building in which the Medical Anthropology Unit of University of Amsterdam is located, and asked me in Bangla, ‘Kemon achhen?’ (How are you?). Prof. Streefland has worked for many years in Bangladesh and has a wide range of experiences in the country. His comments on the several drafts of my proposal and dissertation provided me with crucial insights about Bangladesh and various concepts of medical anthropology, which helped me greatly to focus and sharpen my arguments in this book. I am greatly indebted to his critical comments about my position as an insider researcher of Bangladesh, which forced me to become aware of my subjective biases and become more reflexive. I express my sincere gratefulness to him.

I acknowledge my thankfulness to Dr. Mushtaque R. Chowdhury, my local advisor and the Director of the Research Division of BRAC. My career as a researcher started in 1995 with his supervision and guidance. Although specialised in Demography, much of his pioneering research work on Bangladesh was from anthropological perspective, which inspired me greatly. As the head of the division, he provided me with all sorts of support to further my interest in higher study in Medical Anthropology, a neglected subject in Bangladesh. Apart from a variety of advice concerning my Ph.D. research, he ensured different organisational and office support that made the research possible.

I am grateful to Prof. Dr. Willem van Schendel, a renowned scholar on Bangladesh who provided me with valuable advice concerning literature on Bangladesh. I also am thankful to Dr. Klaas van der Veen, who shared with me his ideas and unpublished articles regarding the comparison of Western and Indian values.
Respondents

This research was possible because of the co-operation of the patients, their relatives and staff members of Chittagong Medical College Hospital. I am deeply indebted to all of them for sharing their experiences, joys and sorrows with me, though for the sake of privacy I will not mention their names. Doing fieldwork in the hospital ward was a revealing experience for me; I was deeply touched by the stories of the people involved. I realised how I had missed the human dimensions of the hospital life when I had been a busy intern doctor in the same ward more than a decade ago. I hope my respondents will have their stories heard through this book. My special thanks to the Professor of the orthopaedic ward who granted me access to the ward.

Friends and colleagues

Getting access in a hospital ward for observational study is difficult. Although my identity as a physician helped me in this regard, it was my friend Dr. Mohammad Ali, who took great interest about my study, and made my access to the hospital ward easy by using his informal networks in Chittagong Medical College Hospital. I am grateful to him. I stayed with my old friends, a painter couple Dhali al Mamoon and Dilara Begum Jolly and also with Abul Mansur and Nazlee Mansur during my fieldwork in Chittagong. They took great interest in my research and I was grateful to be able to share my everyday experiences of the hospital with them over dinner. I am indebted to their great hospitality. Thanks to my friend Dr. Enamul Haque Mukul, a public health physician with whom I shared all the research experiences. I thank my friends Milon Chowdhury, Sonia Nishat Amin, Mahbubul Mokaddem Akash, Lila Rashid and Sajjad Sharif for their continuous encouragement. I also thank my colleagues at BRAC, Dr. Malabika Sarker, Dr. Kaosar Afsana, Dr. Abdullahel Hadi, Dr. Syed Masud Ahmed, Dr. Mohammad Rafi and Mr. Golam Sattar, for their support. I greatly benefited from the comments of the members of the Ph.D. club of Medical Anthropology Unit of University of Amsterdam and the Amsterdam School of Social Science Research (ASSR). Marina de Regt deserves special mention in this regard. Daniel Arhiful, a fellow student in the first batch of Amsterdam Masters in Medical Anthropology (AMMA) started his Ph.D. project at the same time as I. He was a source of great friendship during my stay at Amsterdam. Thanks to Maarten Bode, a great lover of Indian culture and a scholar on Ayurveda. I relish the memory of discussions with him in the beautiful restaurants in the Chinatown at Amsterdam. Sera Young deserves my sincere thanks for taking the laborious responsibility of editing the manuscript. Nicolette van Duursen, finally, translated the summary into Dutch.

Organisations

I express my gratitude to Bangladesh Rural Advancement Committee, BRAC, a leading national development organisation that provided me with various official supports during my fieldwork. I am deeply grateful to Netherlands Foundation for Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO) for funding my Ph.D. project and to the Amsterdam School of Social Science Research (ASSR) for providing me additional financial and administrative support.
Family

During the three and half years that this research has taken, I frequently travelled back and forth between Dhaka, Chittagong and Amsterdam. During the long period of my absence from home, my wife, Papreen Nahar, had to undertake all the trouble of managing the family with two kids, in addition to her responsibilities as researcher at Centre for Health and Population Research, (ICDDR,B) Dhaka. Despite this, she had an unending interest in sharing the excitement, joys and problems of my research and consistently provided inspiration. My deepest gratitude to her. The final corrections of my dissertation were done in Melbourne, Australia, where I accompanied my wife as she began her Ph.D. there. It was then my turn to take care of our kids. Thanks are also due to my two minor sons Neeor Zaman and Shayor Zaman who had to miss the company and affection of their father for a long period. Finally, thanks to my father A.K.M. Ashrafuzzaman, my mother Shahar Banu, my sister Shahina Arfin, my brother-in-law Abul Maksud and my brothers Tauhiduzzaman and Tamziduzzaman for their constant moral support.
