The solidarity of self-interest: Social and cultural feasibility of rural health insurance in Ghana

Arhinful, D.

Citation for published version (APA):
Acknowledgements

Unto the Lord I give the utmost glory and honour for the successful completion of this study and its final product. The study has benefited from the support of several individuals and organisations to whom I am more indebted than the following words can express.

Financial assistance for my studies was made possible through the beneficence of the Netherlands Foundation for the Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO). The Amsterdam School for Social Science Research also provided additional financial support and an excellent and rewarding academic environment for the studies. I am very grateful to them.

I owe a great debt of gratitude to my promotor, Prof. Sjaak van der Geest, first and foremost for his instrumentality in making my studies in the Netherlands possible. I am exceedingly grateful for the inspiration, guidance and supervision he provided me not just as a teacher but also a father that ensured the successful completion of this dissertation. My gratitude extends to his wife Betty, and their family for their moral and total support.

Dr. Bart Criël was involved in the study from the time of the writing of the research proposal. He brought his immense knowledge, expertise and writings on health insurance in sub-Saharan Africa to bear at various stages of the manuscript. I am most grateful to him.

I was privileged to benefit from the expertise, teaching, writings and material support of Prof. Abram de Swaan of the Amsterdamse School. My gratitude goes to to him for reading some chapters of the dissertation and for the short but enriching and beneficial period I spent in his “mutuals promotion club”.

I also thank my mentors and study collaborators in Ghana by extending my utmost gratitude to Professor Samuel Ofosu Amaah, formerly of the School of Public Health of the University of Ghana, for his suggestions and guidance. I am also grateful to Prof. David Ofori-Adjei, Dr. Sam Adjei and Dr. Dyna Arhin for their inspiration, practical support and encouragement.

I ventured into this field of studies without any practical background or experience in health insurance. I have picked up my practical knowledge and “expertise” from daily interactions with my informants and actual “experts”. These were health officials, health staff and community members who became “subjects” of my study. I am particularly grateful to them.

I extend gratitude to Dr. Ayitey Coleman who was the director of the Policy, Planning, Monitoring and Evaluation unit of the ministry of health who granted me official permission to undertake the research in the three districts. I am deeply indebted to the regional and district directors not only for accepting me but also assisting me with practical and logistic support in the communities at various stages of the fieldwork. I also acknowledge the exceptional support of Mr. Simoen Unezemah, the health insurance manager of Nkoranza and Mr Philip Akanzinge, the diocesan Public Health Coordinator of Sunyani. I also acknowledge the assistance of Mr. Kumi Kyeremeh who was the regional health insurance coordinator in the Eastern region at various phases of my fieldwork.
Special thanks go to my field assistants for accommodating my demanding field schedules. The total commitment and interest they showed in the research is highly appreciated. Among them are Ms. Eunice Yeboah, Mr. James Adu-Bonnah, Mr. Samuel Adu-Poku and Oscar Osei of Nkoranza district; David Agyeman, Isaac Odame and Nodzo Edmund of Suhum district; and Ms. Vivian Dzodzodzi, Solomon A. Narh-Bana and Kabu Enock of Dangme West district. There are many others that space limitations do not permit me to mention here.

I acknowledge with profound gratitude and appreciation the warmth and support of both past and present staff of the Amsterdam School. I thank Han Sonneveld, Jose Komen, Miriam May, Teun Bijvoet, Anneka Dammers, Annelies Dijkstra and Albertine van Peursen for their friendship. In them I found a real home far away from home.

Members of the medical anthropology unit promotion club who painstakingly read and made useful suggestions at various stages of the writing process are deeply acknowledged. Again, I am grateful to my colleagues and friends Dr. Zaman, Getnet Tadele and Shifra Kisch of the Amsterdam School for their moral support.

I also acknowledge the support and gratitude of my friends and colleagues at the Centre for Tropical Clinical Pharmacology and Therapeutics, the Ghana National Drugs Programme for the provision of office space and supporting logistics during the fieldwork and data management in Ghana. I greatly appreciate the support of Ms. Pat Coffie of the Health Research Unit for literature search and moral support, and Mrs. Violet Osei for photocopying support.

My thanks also go out to two research assistants Ms. Perpetua Essel and Akosua Bediako for transcribing my interview tapes. Mrs. Loretta Bannerman and Ms. Grace Nkyi of the community health department of the University of Ghana Medical School are thanked for their work with data entry and type writing assistance support, respectively. Dr. Bert Schijff of the Amsterdam School assisted me in some aspects of SPSS statistical analysis. I am also grateful to Dr. Kofi Saah of the Linguistic Department of the University of Ghana and Sera Young in the Netherlands for reading and editing the final manuscript. For all the pain and stress that anybody in Ghana and the Netherlands, known and unknown, endured in having this work finished, I extend my sincerest gratitude.

Above all, I thank my dear wife, Angie, and our sons Nana Ekow and Paa Kojo for their co-operation and support particularly, for bearing with me on occasions that I had to deny them the warmth of my physical presence and attention in the pursuit of academic excellence. Their understanding and sacrifice will not be in vain.

I wish to emphasise however, that I am entirely responsible for any errors, substantial or marginal, which may be found in the following pages.