ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Our biggest debt is to the women workers who accepted us, even though we asked 'strange' questions and called writing 'work'. Their courage to live and struggle with dignity amazed and inspired us. They were lotuses flourishing in muddy waters and all the more stronger because of it. In particular we would like to thank Sharmila and her unflagging perseverance, the silent and patient Jayshree, Bharati who bears her injuries with grace and Jadhavbai who has kept her family together for years. We thank their families who did not mind us invading their holidays. Employers, men workers and trade unionists unhesitatingly shared information with us.

We would have found this long academic journey difficult if not for Joke Schrijvers, our promoter who supported us throughout. Nothing was too small or too big for her attention, from exploring theoretical concepts, to locating housing and setting up bank accounts. She was understanding but firm, disliked bureaucracy but kept the rules, gently prodding us on without being overly critical or intrusive. We felt pulled into her own quest for alternative perspectives amongst diversities and different identities. We are grateful to Isa Baud, our second promoter, who got our statistical data to speak to us and bring a dimension of ground reality and common sense into our work. Her immense knowledge of India and women's labour and near total recall memory gave us access to innumerable articles and books which have changed the face of our chapters. Maithreyi Krishnaraj, our local promoter, unstintingly gave her time, information and books. Rarely do people take such pains to keep perfect time and at the same time read everything with such thoroughness. We were fortunate to have this trio of supervisors giving inputs from an anthropological, sociological and economics perspectives.

For this research study, we had to absent ourselves from Akshara, our women's resource centre and families for about two months every year. We thank Lakshmi Menon, Rajshree Mahtani and Bhavani Shastri for taking over our tasks at Akshara. Nandita Gandhi specially thanks her daughter Radhika, for looking after home and dog and Nandita Shah her mother, for her unconditional love.

This thesis is part of a process began earlier by the project Women Workers and Organisational Strategies co-ordinated by Amrita Chhachhi of the Institute of Social Studies and funded by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs - Department of Development - Co-operation, The Netherlands. It was the collective effort of the WWOS team with Amrita Chhachhi, Sujata Gothoskar and the two of us, which set the initial framework and the questionnaire for the research. It is impossible to forget the hours of comradeship and painful joy at Amrita’s Delhi home, which doubled as our research office. Our Delhi friends, Abha Bhaiya, Kamla Bhasin and Ritu Menon reminded us that there was life outside of research every evening. Dr Jayati Ghosh and Dr Bina Agarwal were the first few people to help us find our research moorings. Nilima Kapse and students from TISS enthusiastically assisted us to conduct some of the interviews with workers.

For the second phase of the study, we have to first thank WOTRO for funding our research, travel and stay in The Netherlands and AGIDS for giving us work space. Our three visits have resulted in a wonderful group of Dutch friends with whom we shared research, gossip, music, books, dinners and friendship. Anneke van Luijken stood by us like a rock. Annette Tesselaar and Donny Meertens, our landladies became friends. Margriet Poppema and Peter Gelaaff’s concern and generosity touched us deeply. Our friends ‘on the same floor’ at the university were Anja Rudnick, Mayke Kromhout, Lorraine Nencel and Philomena Essed who shared their papers, computers and ideas with us. Ellen Lammers and Jeroen Doornenik kindly offered their homes to us. We appreciate the exchange of views with Lineke Stobbe, Peter Knorrina, Irene Van Staveren, Marianne Marchand and AJC Bose.

For the last part of the study, we would like to thank Dr. Sjoer de Vos for clarifying our statistical problems, Sunanda for data processing, Anita Mehta, Chetna Desai for helping in completing our bibliography, Kamal, Chhama, Savla for printing and Anjali Dave for so generously loaning her space to us. And lastly we would like to thank each other for bearing the pleasure and strain of collective working. It was delightful to exchange ideas and criticism and feel secure from the terrifying feelings of isolation and loneliness of writing. But it was only our friendship of fifteen years, which saved us from tempers, tantrums and a nervous breakdown.
