Acknowledgements

During the period in which I conducted my research numerous people have inspired, stimulated, helped and distracted me. I now have the opportunity to thank them. First, I thank my supervisor Arnoud Boot. He encouraged me to study theoretical corporate finance, an endeavor I shall never regret having taken on. During the process discussions with him were always lively and full of ideas. His comments and encouragement have been of great importance for this dissertation.

I started my dissertation under Pol Ankum. Over all these years he played an important role by monitoring, stimulating and always providing me with detailed comments on various drafts of the manuscript. Therefore, I thank him for such confidence and all our enjoyable meetings. I also like to express my gratitude to all of the other members of my dissertation committee: Professors Piet Duffhues, Frank de Jong, Theo Nijman, and Enrico Perotti. All provided valuable comments on an earlier draft of this manuscript. In addition, I am very grateful to Mr. Olde Loohuis, the former treasurer of Fokker. His willingness and openness in discussions were instrumental enabling me to write a case study on Fokker's risk management in Chapter 8. I further thank Jesse Levin, who managed to provide me with numerous editorial suggestions on a very short notice.

On a more personal note I would like to thank Anjolein Schmeits and Ben Jacobsen for their friendship. Anjolein was always willing to read and comment on my work in addition to offering moral support. We also cooperated on many projects which were always great fun (at least in hindsight). Ben Jacobsen used to be my neighbor during most of the period I did my research. We had a great time discussing finance, the real important things in life, and gossiping.

For over ten years I have been working at the Finance Group of the University of Amsterdam. Over that time the group has developed into a high quality and inspiring environment. I thank all members (current and past) for the time we spent together. It has always been a very stimulating and pleasant place to work in. In particular I thank Kick Koster with whom I started many, many years ago, and who always managed to surprise me over lunch with one of his exaggerations, Netty Coolen for her worries about my well being and appearance, and Arianne, for her support on a variety of activities. I also thank Enrico, Liang, Henk and especially Frank whose doors were always open when I had questions and who often came up with good suggestions. In addition, I thank both the Pieters for the fun that we had when you were both still around.

I also thank my family and friends. They always showed their interest and finally no longer need to ask when this whole thing is coming to an end. It is all here and I am very happy about that.

Joris and Jippe, I am incredibly happy to have you around and thank you for all the joy and distraction that you have provided. For you the only interesting part in my computer lies in a train program I once installed and the funny sounds that it makes when you push on several buttons at the same time. I am happy that I have been able to combine writing this dissertation while sharing the care of my children with Mathilde. Therefore, last but not least I thank Mathilde for all of her love and flexibility. By her working at least as hard as I did, I never had to feel bad spending hours behind my computer. However, the ups and especially downs of writing a dissertation do have its impact (although you never managed to stay awake discussing these matters). More importantly, you have made the last ten years a great time.
