Boys buying two sausages each: On the syntax and semantics of distance-distributivity
Zimmermann, M.

Citation for published version (APA):
Zimmermann, M. (2002). Boys buying two sausages each: On the syntax and semantics of distance-distributivity
Utrecht: LOT

General rights
It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Disclaimer/Complaints regulations
If you believe that digital publication of certain material infringes any of your rights or (privacy) interests, please let the Library know, stating your reasons. In case of a legitimate complaint, the Library will make the material inaccessible and/or remove it from the website. Please Ask the Library: http://uba.uva.nl/en/contact, or a letter to: Library of the University of Amsterdam, Secretariat, Singel 425, 1012 WP Amsterdam, The Netherlands. You will be contacted as soon as possible.
Acknowledgements

When I started my studies of German language and literature at the University of Cologne ten years ago, little did I know that I would end up writing a PhD thesis in linguistics. As a matter of fact – back then, I did not even know what linguistics was all about. Over the years, a lot of people have helped at various stages of my becoming a linguist.

In particular, I would like to thank Daniel Büring, who was my first lecturer in linguistics at the University of Cologne. Daniel is the one who got me interested in linguistics in the first place. More importantly, he invited me personally to take an advanced seminar on the history of generative grammar on a chance encounter on the campus. Without this meeting, I would most probably not be writing these lines right now.

Jürgen Lenerz at the University of Cologne gave me the chance to gain more experience in the academic field by employing me as a teaching assistant. Thanks are due to him and to the other members of his chair, in particular Anne Rivet, Susann Siebert, Horst Lohnstein, Robert Kemp, and Kay-Eduardo Gonzales, also for showing me that linguistics was not only an interesting, but also a social discipline.

Having finished my MA thesis at the University of Cologne, I got a PhD position in Amsterdam as part of the PhD program of the Holland Institute of Generative Linguistics (HIL) in Leiden. The HIL and the University of Amsterdam provided me with the right linguistic tuition as well as the general intellectual environment on the way towards this PhD. In particular, I would like to thank Hans den Besten, Johan Rooryck, Crit Cremers, and Lisa Cheng, for their constant willingness to discuss aspects of my research with me. I would also like to thank the participants of the discussion groups both at the University of Amsterdam and at Leiden University, as well as the participants of the DiP-Colloquium at the ILLC for the stimulating discussions. I also owe to the teachers at the LOT summer- and winter schools, and in particular to Richard Larson. Without his encouragement, I would have never dared to submit an abstract to SALT X.

Furthermore, I would like to thank Vincent van Heuven and José Birker (as well as the other Leiden people) for continuing to treat me as part of the HIL-group when it had ceased to exist, and for providing me with a workplace when I lived in Leiden in the spring of 2001.
I am also grateful for the possibility of a stay as guest researcher at the University of California in Santa Cruz in the early spring of 2000, and for the possibility of a stay as guest lecturer at the University of Stuttgart in the fall/winter of 2000/01.

Anikó Lipták played a special role in the coming about of this thesis. She was the first to take interest in the topic - distance-distributive each – and she joined me in the first steps of this enterprise. The story has developed a long way since our Helsinki-talk, even though the underlying assumptions are still the same.

My thesis supervisor Hans den Besten was always ready to discuss aspects of the thesis with me, and he taught me not to lose sight of – seemingly irrelevant – details. Both Hans and my promotress Aafke Hulk made my life easier by taking care of all the administrative business behind the thesis. This was especially valuable to me since I was not in the Netherlands in the final stage of the dissertation. Concerning the latter aspect, thanks are due to Ede Zimmermann, who agreed to jump the thesis-wagon as supervisor for the semantic part of the thesis. I will not forget our almost weekly meetings in various cafés in Berlin, where my semantic ideas and analyses came under close scrutiny, and where I learnt more about semantics than I ever knew before.

Thanks also to Esther Kraak at LOT in Utrecht, who supervised the last steps of the thesis, namely the publication of this book.

My years in Holland would not have been half as much fun without my fellow students both in Leiden and Amsterdam. My classmates Véronique van Gelderen and Erik Jan van der Torre deserve special mention for all the good times we had, including the memorable gypsy-party at the HIL. Furthermore, I would like to thank my fellow students Nancy Chongo Kula, Aniek Ijbema, Marjo van Koppen, Anikó Lipták, Erica Thrift, and Zorex for being good friends and colleagues.

I would like to thank my parents for stimulating my intellectual curiosity at an early stage, and for supporting me in whatever I was doing – even linguistics.

Finally, I would like to thank my wife Halina for her love and constant support, and for bearing with me in the final six months of the thesis.

This book is dedicated to you, Lina!