This thesis contains the results of almost three years of research that I started at the London School of Economics and completed at the University of Amsterdam, while working at the same time as a consultant in the Financial Sector Policy and Research group of the World Bank in Washington, DC. Such a project is never undertaken on your own, and it is therefore that I am indebted to many people.

I especially would like to thank my promotor Sweder van Wijnbergen and co-promotor Stijn Claessens for their encouragement and comments on earlier drafts of this work. Sweder’s enthusiasm and Stijn’s pragmatism have stimulated and directed me towards the correct path without limiting the opportunities to pursue my own ideas and interests. Most of all, I am grateful to Sweder and Stijn for making this journey a pleasant one.

I am also grateful to Theo Nijman and Enrico Perotti, who have influenced this work indirectly. Theo, with his contagious passion for financial econometrics, had given me the tools to structure and test complex ideas, such as those that would come up during discussions with Enrico on my academic work – discussions that have stimulated me tremendously.

Next, I would like to thank Thorsten Beck (World Bank), Geert Bekaert (Columbia University), John Bonin (Wesleyan University), François Bourguignon (World Bank), Jerry Caprio (World Bank), Asli Demirgüç-Kunt (World Bank), Simeon Djankov (World Bank), Xavier Freixas (University of Pompeu-Fabra), Gaston Gelos (International Monetary Fund), Charles Goodhart (London School of Economics), Patrick Honohan (World Bank), Daniela Klingebiel (World Bank), Inessa Love (Columbia University), Giovanni Majnoni (World Bank), Vojislav Maksimovic (University of Maryland), Frederic Mishkin (Columbia University), George Pennacchi (University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign), Enrico Perotti (University of Amsterdam), Hélène Rey (London School of Economics), David Webb (London School of Economics) and my fellow students at the London School of Economics for valuable comments on earlier drafts of parts of this work and/or for helpful discussions. Several chapters also benefited from comments from seminar participants at the London School of Economics, the University of Amsterdam and the World Bank.

Furthermore, I would like to thank Simon Commander (EBRD) and Mark Schaffer (Heriot-Watt University) for providing the data of the 1994 World Bank/Russian Academy of Sciences Russian enterprises survey, John Earle (Stockholm School of Economics) for providing the questionnaire of the 1994 World Bank/Russian Academy of Sciences Russian enterprise survey, and Simeon Djankov (World Bank) and Peter Murrell (University of Maryland) for providing the data and questionnaire of the 1997 World Bank/Russian Academy of Sciences Russian enterprise survey, both used in Chapter 1. I also thank Ying Lin (World Bank) for providing the WorldScope data used in Chapter 3, and Tae Soo Kang (Bank of Korea) for providing the data on the ownership of Korean firms used in Chapter 4.
Finally, I would like to thank my parents Hubert and Lucy, and my wife Olga for their continued support. As a sign of my gratitude I dedicate this work to them.
