On testing plausible threats to construct validity
Schouwstra, S.J.

Citation for published version (APA):
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Without professor Johan Hoogstraten I would not have been able to write this dissertation, hence I feel greatly indebted to him. I thank him for giving me much freedom in molding the dissertation project to suit my interests and ideas. He gave me much encouragement and many opportunities throughout the years. I am especially grateful that he actively sought ways to prevent that I would be forced to work outside the university as well, in order to provide for my self and my child. Also, I would like to thank professor Don Mellenbergh for the critical reading of the chapters.

I am thankful to the members of the section Psychological Methodology, all the people with whom I shared my room for some time during those past years and the other Ph.D. trainees of the IOPS (Interuniversity Graduate School of Psychometrics and Sociometrics) working at the department of Psychology. Together they created a stimulating, educating and companionable environment by sharing their knowledge, many a discussion, lunch, cup of coffee and after-work drink with me. I would especially like to thank Paul Oosterveld, Bert van Engelenburg, Dave Hessen and Denny Borsboom, for their help, friendship and impassioned discussions on methodology, statistics and validity.

Furthermore, I like to acknowledge all my friends whose friendship and support made writing this dissertation so much easier. I especially thank my close friends, Peter Tamboer, Marjon van Roosendaal, and Ron Spee, for their friendship, their interest, and constant support, for taking my mind off work when needed and keeping my mind on work when necessary. Also, I have to thank all those parents of my daughter's friends who showed an interest in our wellbeing and offered help especially the parents of Semna and Juliette. Without their collaboration, I would most probably not have been able to work fulltime, given the lack of after-school care or affordable alternatives in Amsterdam.

Most of all I like to thank my family, especially my sister and my mother. Without their love and support, writing this dissertation would have been exceedingly difficult. I thank my sister, Marije Schouwstra for being my best and dearest friend all my life, for giving me the much needed evenings off by babysitting and for listening to all my complaints. I thank my mother for painstakingly reading and correcting my entire dissertation, for babysitting, for taking care of my daughter during many school holidays, for rushing over whenever my daughter fell ill, and for doing regularly the odd household jobs. But most of all I am grateful to my mother for enabling me to work day and night for two months with relative ease, by moving in and looking after my daughter, myself and my house. Finishing my dissertation within the three and a half years given to me would have been impossible without my mother’s tremendous help and love.

Last, but definitely not least, I want to thank my daughter Rashèl for the great pleasure and love she gives me and for being so cooperative and understanding this last year of hard work. I hope her interest and curiosity will remain as catchy to me as they are. May she continue to compel me temperamentally to shift my attention from work to her and to ensure that I marvel with her at the fascinating, wondrous world surrounding us both.
"The question [of validity] is thoroughly roused from a slumber of centuries, probably never to sleep again" (Kelley, 1927, p. 13-14).