ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In the six years since I started my study of Tajikistan many people have helped and supported me. Without them my work would have been considerably more difficult and less pleasant. I shall try to remember them all here. If I have accidentally forgotten to name anyone please do not think I am the less indebted.

My thanks to Greet Vink and the FUOS fund of the University of Amsterdam for providing me with two grants that, although for other projects, nevertheless allowed me to continue working on my dissertation without taking a job and thus to make time to finish it. My thanks to Dave Hampson, Sjoerd van Schooneveld, and the others who helped us get the first grant from Christian Aid for the Khatoon Women’s Health Project, and to Edith Wallmeier and the other CARE staff who enabled us to receive our EU/TACIS grant, which has allowed me to continue working in Tajikistan to this day and our project to work on some of the most critical problems of Tajik women.

My thanks also to Max Spoor for his comments on one of the earlier drafts, to Lorraine Nencel for her invaluable comments and suggestions for the final draft, to Natalya Kosmarskaya, Deniz Kandiyotti, to Mayke Kromhout for her suggestion for the layout of the contents page, and to others for their useful material on related topics to Tajikistan, and their support of my research. Thanks to Rayna Rapp, Paolo Possiedi, Rosalind Petchesky, and my other New York friends for their support while I was doing my research there, to Ron Porta and Heather Mackay for welcoming me as guests while I was reading in the British Library. Thanks also to the members of InDRA and AGIDS of the University of Amsterdam for their support and to many staff members of ISS, especially to René Bekius for his bibliographical contributions.

I wish to express my gratitude to Olga Dmitrieva, Natalya Kosmarskaya, and my other friends in Moscow for their support during my visits there and for their introductions to people in Tajikistan at a time when I knew not a single person there, to Larissa Dodkhudoeva for first inviting me to Tajikistan, to Mr. Rakhimov, Director of the Institute of World Economics for allowing me to become a temporary guest researcher there in 1995, to Safro Isaeva for many things, but especially for her introduction to her aunt Karomat without whom I would have never had come to understand Tajikistan half as well as I do today, to Ayesha Homed whose comments and introductions were also invaluable, to Dr. Sofia H. Hakimova for her help on matters relating to reproductive health, to the members of the ethnographic department of the Tajik Academy of Sciences for their bibliographical support, to the librarians of the Academy of Sciences library for their assistance, to Zoya M. Tajikova, Savely A. Dvorin, Zarrina Mirshakar, Zhukhra Akhmedova, Volodya Savvateev and Margarita Voytova among many others who have helped me personally so much during my visits to Tajikistan. Thanks to all my friends from the international organizations in Tajikistan while I was working on my dissertation, especially those from Human Rights Watch, IFRC, Mission Oest, MSF Holland, OSCE, Relief International, Save the Children Fund (UK), and WFP. Especially thanks to the libraries of the Academy of Sciences, the Firdousi National Library of Tajikistan, ACCELS, and others for providing me with reading material outside my research work without which I could not have psychologically survived my time in Tajikistan.
Acknowledgments

Zarafshon Zuhurova, Gabrielle van den Berg, Mohinissko Shonazarova, Hurshed Babaev, Kalongul Magzumova, Barno Toshboltaeva, Ayesha Homed, Gulnora Suvankolova, and Bahodur Toshmatov kindly allowed me to print the stories they told me. I owe a great deal also to all the staff of the Khatlon Women’s Health Project, who supported me and continue to support me and whose work has helped me learn so much about the culture of Tajikistan. An especial thanks to Bahodur Toshmatov, who took much of the administrative weight of the project off my back. And of course, a very, very special thanks to all those women (and men), who spent so many hours of their time with me recounting their (life) stories and without whose friendship and generosity this book would not have been possible.

I am grateful to John Borstlap for the Dutch translation of the Summary as well as for his moral and practical support.

Last but most certainly not least most heartfelt thanks to my supervisor Joke Schrijvers, for her patience and understanding, for her sensitivity in not pressing or constraining me but instead allowing me to work at my own pace and in my own way. Without Joke’s personal commitment and friendship, without her helpful guidance I do not think I could have managed to come through with this project. A great part of what is good in this book is owing to her.

Finally, I owe a great deal to the support of those persons, alas now gone from amongst us, to whom I have dedicated this book. Clif and Michael died before I started my doctorate, but had they still been with us I am sure they would have supported me through this project, as they did through so many in the past. Ruth helped me through many different phases of my life and was fascinated by the present one. Viktor Alekseevich and Mikhail Mikhailovich spent the greatest part of their lives in Tajikistan and collected many useful books, some of which they passed on to me, and Karomat was my daily companion in Dushanbe during my first three trips to Tajikistan. The place she occupied in my research will become clear to anyone who reads this book.
