For me, the final phase of writing this thesis had the character of "making-up the balance", both scientifically and personally. This made me realize that this thesis is not just a (small) piece to the big scientific puzzle, but also a symbol of a very pleasant period of my life. For both of these aspects, the thoughts and the fun, I owe much thanks to several people.

First of all I would like to thank Russell. The moment of our first collaboration (almost seven years ago when he was my supervisor during the research practical) was also the moment that I knew that I wanted to become a doctoral researcher. Since then, I have not learned from anyone within the academic world more than from Russell. His theoretical originality and creativity, paired with his practical attitude make him a great teacher. Also in terms of process working with Russell was pleasant, not in the least part because of his great sense of humor and our common affection to "play upon words".

Furthermore, I wish to thank Bertjan and Tony, who also had a big influence on the current project and my development as a researcher. I have strongly benefited from Bertjan’s keen eye for possible confounds and for interpreting complex interactions. Moreover, with his "down to earth" attitude Bertjan played an important role in the perfect “chemistry” during our meetings with Russell (especially when Russell and I went lost in our enthusiasm). Although Tony stayed somewhat more in the background with regard to the daily supervision, this thesis would have been completely different, both in content and in form, without him. His advise at the “strategic moments” about (meta-)theoretical issues and his detailed corrections of my English are just two examples of this.

I have been in the privileged position to spend some time with Nyla Branscombe at the University of Kansas. I have learned a lot from Nyla’s own and unique vision on inter-group relations, which has also resulted in a nice research project that we developed together. Moreover, the current work has also improved through my trip to Kansas. Apart from that it gave me the opportunity to take some distance and to put things into perspective, Nyla’s comments on specific parts of this thesis have been of great value. I also wish to thank her for making my stay in Kansas such a pleasant and unforgettable time.
I want to thank the members of the leesgroep inter-group relations, the juniorenoverleg, and the labgroep for their valuable comments on parts of the current work. In particular I want to thank Ruud and Sven. Apart form our interesting discussions about inter-group relations, emotions and LISREL, the two of you were also from a social point of view the ideal roommates. With much joy I look back to our indoor-rondos (with serious danger for your computer and observation apparatus due to my motorical disturbedness).

I also would like to thank my friends Mattijs, Eelco, Ward, Onno, Menno and all other members of z.c. De Drijvende Dobber for the much needed weekly “refreshments”. Some parts of this thesis were written during two work-vacations in Mirtos and Schweiberg. I would like to thank my fellow travelers/students for their cozy companion.

I wish to thank Christel. Her support, confidence and love have been of immeasurable value.

Thanks!
