The studies in this thesis would not have come to be without the contribution, help and encouragement of many people and institutions in Ethiopia, Nigeria and UK, whom I am sincerely grateful.

I would like to take this opportunity to single out those institutions and people that played a particularly important role in the realisation of this thesis.

First and foremost I want to thank all TB patients who participated in the studies.

_In Ethiopia_, I express my gratitude to the Southern Region Health Bureau, Bushullo Major Health Centre, Ireland Aid Ethiopia, Armauer Hansen Research Institute and the National TB and Leprosy Control Programme, and to colleagues working in these institutions for their continuous support. My special thanks go to Dr's Isable Arbid, Estifanos Birru and Abraham Aseffa.

_In Liverpool, UK_, I am forever grateful to Dr Luis E. Cuevas, my mentor and co-promoter for introducing me to clinical epidemiology, making everything possible and bringing me back to Liverpool after my Masters study. This work wouldn't have been materialised without the generous support and unremitting encouragement of Luis.

I express my appreciation and thanks to my promoter Professor Bernard Brabin for giving me the opportunity to do this PhD and for organisation and all his encouragement and support throughout the process.

I am grateful to Dr. Bertel Squire for his continuous and valuable comments and support, Andy Ramsay, Dr Tim O'demsey, Dr Alexis Cambanis, Emily Savory, Barry Moody, Pauline Anderson and all the staff of the Liverpool School of Tropical Medicine for their support and encouragement.

_In Nigeria_, I would like to appreciate and thank Dr Lovett Lawson and his team at Zankli Medical Centre. I am grateful to the nurses and data enumerators at the district hospitals of Abuja for their valuable contribution and help during the study.
To my parents, my sisters and brothers for their everlasting love and support. For all my friends and colleagues in Ethiopia.

I am always grateful to my wife, Fozi for her unwavering encouragement, support and love which words couldn't express.
