This PhD-research is a cooperative effort from the Royal Netherlands Naval Academy, the Royal Netherlands Military Academy, the Netherlands Organisation for Applied Scientific Research (TNO Defence and Security), and the University of Amsterdam. TNO Defence and Security I thank for financing this research and the Royal Naval Academy for paying for my research-trips to Australia, the United States and Kosovo. There are many people to whom I owe gratitude for the realisation of this project. My greatest debt is to my PhD-advisors Professor Herman Amersfoort and Professor Ger Teitler, and to my advisor at TNO, Gerben Klein Baltink. I thank them for guiding the project from its inception and, once it got underway for giving me the necessary time as I struggled to master the complexities of civil-military interaction in twentieth century military operations. Having found direction in the murky civil-military arena after that first year, they provided me with the necessary leeway and trust to mould my findings into chapters and finally into this book. I am also indebted to Professor Ruud Janssens from the University of Amsterdam for being an intellectual sparring partner, for encouraging me to ask big questions, and for being an important but gentle critic. One person that played a crucial role in the last phase of the writing process is Gary Price, who helped to correct my English and stimulated me to think critically about my own writing. Most important, he was always there as a friend who helped to boost my morale while I was trying to finish my book. Finally I want to thank Madelon, who entered my life as the writing process was gathering momentum, and who has lived with the project daily ever since. I am indebted for her moral encouragement, but most of all for brightening my life and for helping me to keep focus on what truly matters.
