Writing a dissertation and carrying out the research it is based on without getting stuck along the way is a long and complex process, and for making the completion of this book possible I owe much to many. In the first place I am deeply indebted to my two supervisors Hans Knippenberg and Virginie Mamadouh. Although for some outsiders the process of this research may have appeared to run smoothly, this would not have been the case without the constructive criticism of Hans and Virginie, redirecting me to the core of the matter from paths that were going nowhere, correcting me when my writing was too hard to follow for those less on top of things than themselves, taking away my incertitudes about content and presentation, and by always being available to give comments. I want to thank them for the confidence they put in this research. I should also mention Herman van der Wusten, who came up with the initial idea way back in the autumn of 2000, which resulted in my Masters thesis, which again was the basis of this dissertation. I am sure the final result has diverged enormously from the initial question, but it would not exist without that initial spark of inspiration.

Within the Amsterdam institute of Metropolitan and International Development Studies at the University of Amsterdam there have been many others that took an interest in my research, made useful comments or organised occasions for thought-provoking discussions. The opportunities to present my research within the Territories, Identities and Representations theme group and the ‘s-group’ with other PhD researchers provoked reflection on and revision of my research and of ways to better explain what I was trying to say. Individually, many others have given helpful comments and criticism, I want to name Jan Mansvelt Beck for his suggestions on my Spanish and Galician chapters and research.

But, I have not remained confined to the boundaries of my research institute for four years. For my research I have visited the three regions on which this project has focused, Galicia, Brittany and Wales, and the capitals of the states they are part of, Madrid, Paris and London. Apart from the opportunity to collect data, those trips allowed me to get a feeling for the atmosphere and society of those regions, something I have enjoyed very much. During my visits many people at the Universidade de Santiago de Compostela, the Université de Rennes I and II, Cardiff University and the University of Wales at Aberystwyth have helped me with advice, expert knowledge and friendship to make me feel welcome during my solitary research periods. I especially want to thank Ramón Máiz, Marga Gomez-Reino Cachafeiro, John Loughlin, and Romain Pasquier for facilitating my visits. I have also bothered many libraries, archives and organisations with questions, frantic quests for obscure documents and hurried visits, and claimed time of people with little time on their hand for interviews. I am grateful for their patience and willingness to not only respond to my requests, but show a genuine interest in the research as well. In the latest stages of my research Ramón Máiz, Romain Pasquier and Anwen Elias have read earlier drafts of the chapters on Galicia, Brittany and Wales and suggest improvements, giving me the confidence that I was not completely missing the point in describing developments in the region they are so much more familiar with than I am.

The Amsterdam Institute for Metropolitan and International Development Studies (AMIDSt) and the CM Kan-Instituut gave me the opportunity to work at this research for four years, and gain some teaching experience along the way. But this book has not come about only through research, it had to be published as well, and I am grateful to Howard Turner for checking the English of this text, to the UvA Kaartenmakers for making the maps, and to the J.E. Jurriaanse Stichting for supporting this publication financially. I also want to thank the Centro de Investigaciones Sociológicas, the Observatoire Interrégional du Politique and the National Centre for Social Research for allowing me to use their survey data.

Although writing a dissertation is at times a lonely venture, the presence of many other PhD researchers at AMIDSt, experiencing similar obstacles, break-throughs, frustrations, and interests have brightened my daily activities. With many of them I have shared an office, Maartje, Mariana, Paula, Niels, Cordula, Lianne, Ralph, Edith, Fennie and Marieke, thanks for the company! A final word I want do dedicate to my family, my mum and dad, and sisters Frouke and Margot. They did not only contribute to this book by reading parts of it, correcting grammatical mistakes, and taking an interest in its progress. My gratitude goes much deeper, because they provided me with a desire to find out about this world and an aim to avoid taking things for granted without which I would never even have started this research.
