Various people have helped make this book possible. First of all, I am indebted to all the people who have dedicated their lives to the cause of peace and who have given me their time, knowledge and inspiration as I met them in Kenya, Ghana, Liberia, Sierra Leone, the Philippines, Cambodia, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Serbia, the UK and the Netherlands. I hope to be able to give something back in the form of useful findings and ideas and will make an effort to ensure that they reach you.

I am most grateful to professor Isa Baud, my promotor, who was immediately supportive of my plans when I first approached her and who, as the study progressed, provided crucially critical guidance and advice. I have found our feedback sessions stimulating and have learnt a lot about what makes research scientifically sound.

Highly valuable, as always, has been the support and advice throughout the research process – and before, and beyond – of professor Gerd Junne, my friend, co-promotor, and collaborator in many projects. Early on, Gerd played a major role in helping design the research project and its practical implementation. As co-lecturer at the ISHSS he has taught me a great deal, helped make teaching easy and enjoyable and made it possible for me to travel by taking on classes while I was away. As co-promotor he has provided constructive feedback and valuable support. As friend and sparring partner he has listened, shared, and creatively helped me to develop synergies from among the various research, teaching and advisory projects that I did and that we did together.

The financial support of the Dutch development organisations ICCO and Cordaid and of the research school AMIDSt bought me the time needed to carry out the research. In particular I would like to thank Lisette van der Wel and Caroline Ort at ICCO and Lia van Broekhoven and Eelco de Groot at Cordaid. Not only have they made funds available, but they have offered other types of resources as well in the form of their ideas, experiences, and contacts in the field. Another source of material support was an NWO travel grant that contributed to my field research in Southeast Asia.

The logistics of my research trips have been greatly helped by people such as Florence Mpaayei in Kenya, Edward Jombla in Sierra Leone, Emmanuel Bombande in Ghana, Gus Miclat and Farha Ajir in Mindanao, Emma Leslie in Cambodia, and Raya Kadyrova and Kristel Maasen in Central Asia. Thank you for putting me into touch with people and organisations in your regions, for helping me organise my travels, and for having been some of the most inspiring people I have met along the way.

I would also like to thank the people and organisations that commissioned consultancy projects and allowed me to use them as opportunities to enrich my research for this book. I am particularly grateful to Juliette Verhoeven and Guido de Graaf Bierbrauwer of ECCP for our pleasant cooperation during the GPPAC review and to Simon Fisher, Alex Moore, and Vesna Matovic of RTC for their valuable thoughts and discussions in the framework of ACTS.

Dr. Rob Hagendijk, Dean of the International School for Humanities and Social Sciences (ISHSS), stimulated me to start a PhD project in the first place, and to do it in a relatively short time-span. At the ISHSS I was able to develop and teach courses that matched my research topic, making possible a fruitful interchange between teaching and research.

Once again, my mother has been my editor, spending a great deal of time going over the text, making constructive suggestions to improve its consistency and readability, and helping me out with practical editorial work. Our writing week together in France was particularly productive and enjoyable.

Thinking back to the final writing stages of this book I will always remember how my unborn child kept me company and constantly reminded me of his presence. Meanwhile, my husband Ewoud Poerink, always supportive in every way, is building our new family a home as I write this. Not just for that, he deserves my special thanks.
