This work came about as a result of the support and encouragement of many friends and colleagues. My first and greatest debt of gratitude is to my two supervisors at the University of Amsterdam, Peter Verdonk and John Neubauer. I will be forever grateful for their erudite guidance and encouragement over the years while this project progressed slowly outside teaching hours, during weekends and summer breaks. Peter was there from the start and John joined the project in the last couple of years. Their contribution to this work is immeasurable. Their input was rewarded in October 2007 when I was invited by the Linguistics Circle of Oxford University to give a one-hour keynote speech on the content of this thesis, which was well received by a large group of linguists, literary scholars and cognitive psychologists. While writing this dissertation I also received sound advice on what to read, and where to read it, from many scholars including Catherine Emmott, Paul Simpson, Gerard Steen, Peter Stockwell and Raymond W. Gibbs Jr. Drafts of my work were edited and critiqued at various stages of development by Ernestine Lahey, Simone Langley, Rocio Montoro and Peter Stockwell. I am grateful for their input and advice: all errors that still appear in the text remain mine. I consider myself immensely fortunate to have studied at the University of Amsterdam as both an undergraduate and a graduate student under the guiding lights of several inspirational instructors including Mieke Bal, Teun van Dijk, Olga Fischer, Paul Werth and especially Peter Verdonk. Without their stimulation and erudition, and that of others in the Engels Seminarium where I spent most of my time as a student, I would not be the lecturer and scholar I am today. I am also grateful to the Amsterdam School for Cultural Analysis Theory and Interpretation (and especially to Eloë Kingma) for the initial bursary I received and for providing me with a warm and trusted environment in which to work during the early stages of this project as bursaalstudent. I am also grateful to all my old colleagues and former students in the English departments at the University of Amsterdam, The Free University Amsterdam and Utrecht University. This debt of gratitude also extends to my present colleagues and students at the Roosevelt Academy, Middelburg, all of whom continue to inspire me. I am also indebted to my fellow members of the International Poetics and Linguistics Association (far too numerous to mention here) for their constant intellectual motivation. Friends are essential for the budding thesis writer: they remind you of who you are and why the world matters. I am fortunate enough to have them in spades. Some of those who made my journey agreeable over the years include: Murat Aydemir, Maaike Bleeker, Stephan Besser, Joe Bray, Liza Berry, Andrew Burke, Julie Burke, Szilvia Csábi, Jo Gavins, Joyce Goggin, Anne Henry, Angus Kennedy, Mark Janse, Ernestine Lahey, Andrew Lord, Catherine Lord, Simone Langley, Rocio Monoro, Michael Omerod, Nanette de Nunzio, Jetty Peterse, Marleen Rensen, Mark Rothwell, Terry Ruane, Giles Scott-Smith, Paul Simpson, Peter Stockwell, Nina Todorova, Marilyn van Veen, Sasha Vojkovic, Sandra Winterswijk, Martin Wynne and all my old study friends from the Amsterdam Bejaardensoos and from Room 501 in the Bungehuis. Finally, I should like to express a special debt of gratitude to Helle K. Hochscheid for her love and for all her patience and assistance with this project: long has she had to put up with my thesis-related frustrations and grumpiness. I will be there for you Helle when your time comes. This dissertation, however, is dedicated jointly to the caring and consoling authors of my own days: my mother Brenda Burke and my father Brian Burke (†1993). … So we read on.
