Acknowledgments

Shortly after I finished my MA thesis in philosophy, Mieke Bal encouraged me to join the ASCA seminars. This was in 1999 and the seminars were still taking place in the impressive room 101 in the Bungehuis, where the furniture and the paintings of mostly old male scholars did not escape the scrutiny of cultural analysis. Not only is Mieke Bal one of the founders of ASCA, her active participation in the seminars inspired many students like me. Mieke has an extraordinary talent to see the complexity of what is seemingly simple; a complexity that she then disentangles with rigorous logical reasoning. The seminars formed an invigorating intellectual environment to which I feel indebted, among the participants in these first years were Michael Burke, Yolande Jansen, Catherine Lord, Sudeep Dasgupta, Sean de Koekkoek, Jaap Kooijman, Ihab Saloul, Stephan Besser, Joyce Goggin and many others. I took a break from the university for a couple of years, but returned in 2005, again encouraged by Mieke Bal who then agreed to be my supervisor. Her advice and critique were always direct and unscrupulous, which asked for resilience, but also made clear that she was convinced that I could do better. I want to thank her for her stimulations and guidance during all those years and, above all, her analytical thought, which has taught me more than I can say.

Secondly – but considering the hours he has spent on my study “secondly” is as much worth as a “firstly” – I want to thank Murat Aydemir. I am impressed by Murat’s capacity for critical thinking, always challenging my thoughts, with his keen sense of humor, mocking, yet never unfriendly, and – very important – his enormous effort in editing my meandering sentences, in which I tend to repeat myself, like I do now perhaps, this text being the only text that is not rigorously cut by Murat. Thank you, Murat, for making this study into a manageable whole, for making it more crisp and sharp, while also always being there for reassuring comments and support.

Now, all the others that have been of importance to the development of my thesis. Let me start in a chronological order. I am deeply indebted to my friends Robert van Altena, Martijn Blekendaal en Simon van Melick, who I met during my philosophy study; our discussions of literature, film, art or any seemingly random object in our surrounding formed the start for the state of mind of being a cultural analyst. I also want to thank Noortje Marres. Once, long ago, we studied philosophy together at the New School for Social Research. We often disagreed, but in our disagreements we challenged each other's thoughts and became close friends. Another genius in analytical thought and good friend is Paulina Fugueli Aroch. Paulina and I met each other through ASCA and I am convinced, although she lives in Mexico and I am afraid of crossing the Atlantic, that we will continue to be fellow travelers in thought, and thus in life. My other two friends who I got to know via Paulina and our shared office in the Spuitstraat are Lucy Cotter and Astrid van Weijenberg. I am afraid that I will never again have the opportunity to share an office with such fun and caring colleagues, who would make me laugh, even in the moments that I felt miserable. They both were a great comfort, as well as Noa Roei, whose dedication to her subject I have always admired. I also want to mention the other colleagues in our office Aylin Kuryel, Erin La Cour, Lilia Perez and Jay Hetrick, and I especially want to thank Adam Chambers for his wonderful friendship and his good sense for the absurd in the tragic.

Before we moved to the Spuistraat, I shared an office with Huub van Baar, Joy Smith and Alena Alexandrova, we were hidden in the cellar of the Oude Turfmarkt and had our own separate atmosphere there. I enjoyed the long discussions with Huub on Dutch journalism as well as our dissertations, both of which were 'almost' finished for a long time. I also want to thank all the other ASCA colleagues, who have been inspiring company, Vesna Madzosi, Jules Sturm, Saskia Lourens, Eliza Steinbock, Laura Copier, Begum Firat, Maria Boletsi, Hanneke Stuit, Carolyn Birdsall, Jan Heijn Hoogstad, Margaret Tali, Alexandra Brown, Birkan Tas, Blandine Joret. And for great guidance in the theory seminars Mieke, Murat, Hanneke Grootenboer, Mireille Rosello, Sudeep Dasgupta. For her fun workshops Susan Stocker. I also want to express my gratitude to Dan Hassler-Forest, with whom I shared my first overwhelming teaching experiences.

During all the years of being an ASCA student, Eloë Kingma was there. Eloë's smile is inseparable from my thoughts of ASCA. Especially when still working in the office at the Oude Turfmarkt, the sound of roaring laughter of Eloë, Jantine van Gogh and Ania Dalecki belonged to the atmosphere of my academic research. With Ania I developed a friendship through our conversations about literature and life, which meant a lot to me. I owe special thanks to them, as well as to Margreet Vermeulen for her efficiency and the fun conversations we shared. Likewise I want to thank Bregje van Eekelen, for her personal, and administrative care. I should also mention that the realization of my study was only possible with the full term AiO position financed by the KNAW.

I am grateful to those who have made the public defense of my dissertation possible, Maarten Doorman, Elsbeth ETTY, Joyce Goggin, Wanda Strauven and Thomas Vaessens, as well as my two paranympths Margriet van Heesch and Claire Weeda, who have also been working on their PhD studies in the same period. The three of us started around 2005 and we are all finishing now. Apart from sharing our frustrations and inspiration concerning our studies, we shared many other aspects of life, went through crises, happiness and always laughed a lot. In the same vain, I want to thank my very close friend Maaike Timmers, with whom I have shared almost every existential question I can think of.

Last but not least I want to thank Joris and our children, Maja and Egon. Memories of working on my thesis will always be accompanied by beautiful images of the first years of Maja en Egon's childhood. I also want to thank my parents, Liesbeth en Harry, because they have always been there, solidly in the background.
