ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This study reflects an intellectual and a personal experience during which I met many people who had a decisive influence on my academic development. It is with great joy and pride that I acknowledge the following people, and it is also with a deep sense of loss that I remember others.

My dissertation would not have started, let alone continued and finished, were it not for Mieke Bal's intellectual collaboration, critical input and continuous support through every stage of my research; all the chapters were written under her watchful eye. As a dissertation supervisor, Mieke's capacity to eliminate defence mechanisms, from both scholars and texts, is nothing short of a natural talent. She encouraged and gave me freedom to explore, productively worried and finally performed the role of an intellectual midwife for which I owe her more than words can express. I consider myself lucky for having had the opportunity to participate in her Theory Seminar during the Mphil and the PhD programs at The Amsterdam School for Cultural Analysis (ASCA), where I learned a great deal about critical theory and about how to write. Above all, I learned about how to perform cultural analysis especially tackling some of the complexities inherent in its interdisciplinary practice and self-reflexive methodology wherein, as Mieke repeatedly explained, the awareness of the analyst's situatedness in the present is always at stake in what he or she does.

Another person who was central to my research project at ASCA and had an impact on my intellectual trajectory, and personal vision of academic scholarship, as an "encountering practice" is the late Inge E. Boer. Although I am grateful to have had the opportunity to work with Inge, her untimely death, on 19 May 2004, during the second year of my research has been a great intellectual loss. Among the many knowledgeable, talented, witty and committed teachers I encountered throughout my life, there was simply something about the way Inge taught. Listening and talking to her always felt like a friendly interaction where seriousness of thought and being at ease combined. Inge was a role model and a source of inspiration as a scholar and a teacher.

After Inge, I was fortunate to work with Murat Aydemir. I am deeply grateful to Murat for his enthusiasm and generous advice, meticulous criticism and fine editorial skills, which were a tremendous help in finishing this book. Other scholars upon whose indulgence, continuing belief and support for my project and valuable comments I learned from were Ernst van Alphen, Ginette Verstraete, Carol Bardenstein, Timothy Brennan, Ray Chow, Gene Moore, Sharif Kanaana, Isabel Hoving, Catherine Lord, Tarik Sabry, Myriam Cherti, Sam Durrant, Patricia Kanaana, Khaled Shuqair, Assad Jaber, and Santiago Vaquera. Each of these people contributed to my study by reading parts of it at different stages of the writing, by their suggestions on versions of chapters presented at conferences, or by sharpening my thinking on this subject in discussions with them.

For institutional and financial support of my project, I am grateful to ASCA. My special thanks go to Eloe Kingma and Jantine van Gogh. Their efficiency in managing ASCA's office is exemplary, and their warm presence kept ASCA's door always open offering professional advice and help whenever necessary. I also thank De Nederlandse Organisatie voor Wetenschappelijk Onderzoek (NWO) for financing my research trip to the Gaza Strip in 2004, which allowed me to write the final chapter on oral narratives of al-nakba. I would like to thank all the interviewees who have been so kind to open their hearts and minds to me. I am especially indebted to Ramiz Younis, Rula Muhaissen, Nader Al Qaseer, Ra'fat Radwan, Tawfiq Sabri Abu Hussain, and Fayez Elian for their generous assistance with collecting the interviews and help with my research in ways above and beyond the call of duty.

I had the pleasure of teaching different courses at the department of literary studies (ALW). I thank all my students for their questions and insights. I am also grateful to my colleagues Jan Hein Hoogstad, Esther Peeren, Mireille Rosello, Joost de Bloois, Solange Leibovici, Mieke Taat, Hanneke Grootenboer, Margreet Vermeulen, and Ania Dalecki for their stimulating conversation, professionalism and helpful support.

Living away from Palestine and working on this project in Amsterdam was much more than a professional experience because of the friendship of my fellow doctoral candidates at ASCA. I had the pleasure of co-organizing the first and the second meetings of Cultural Analysis Summer Academy (CASA) – respectively on “Theory and Practice” (2-5 July 2004), and “Borders, Markets, Movements” (17-20 June 2005) – with Bastiaan Hoorneman, Cornelia Gräbner, Begüm Firat, Kate Khatib, Robert Maier, Saskia Lourens, Carolyn Birdsall, Maria Boletsi, Noa Roei, Sarah De Mul, and Pieter Verstraete: your bright ideas and critical input but, most of all, your joyful companionship made this collective effort truly unforgettable. Together with Bregje van Eekelen, Begüm Firat, Sonja van Wichelen, and Sarah De Mul, I also organized ASCA's international workshop on “Trajectories of Commitment and Complicity: Knowledge, Politics, Cultural Production” in March 2006. I am grateful for my co-organizers and for the sophisticated contributions of all the keynote speakers and participants of the workshop. Their questions and comments on the paper I presented helped me fine-tune my arguments, and also inspired me to take my work in new directions.

One other group of people deserves my thanks for their warm camaraderie: Naser Attiah, Mohammed Hassouna, Elias Qraitem, Dima Mohammed, Hilla Dayan, Alena Alexandrova, Huub van Baar, Paulina Aroch Fugellie, Joy Smith, Sean de Koekkoek, Emmanuelle Radar, Marijke de Valck, Tarja Laine, Astrid van Weyenberg, Maryn Wilkinson, and P.W. Zuidhof. I am very grateful to Michael Katzberg for taking the time to do the copy-editing of my manuscript. Of course, I am entirely responsible for any remaining errors or omissions that the manuscript may contain.

I thank Esme Eijkenaar, Eelco van Anken, Sita Buma, Bart Kinket, Brendan Monaghan, Sami Abdeen, Hani Abdeen, and Letje Lips for their friendship, but above all for standing by me when I arrived in Amsterdam.

Finally, I thank my family in Gaza – my mother Hamdia, my brother Nidal, and my sisters Wesam, and Sabrin, my great grandmother Amna and my grandmothers Sarah, and Fatima – for believing in me and never ceasing to see my potential. Their strong faith and optimism about life always kept me going. I thank my wife, Barbara, for her love, for putting up with my frequent absences, and for giving me the most beautiful thing in my life: our precious daughter Lina. I dedicate this book to Lina and her new Palestinian generation in exile. I hope this book will speak to them and that they will carry some understanding of these ideas with them into better times in the future.
